"It's a curious thing," he said, "and shows weakness of character. But apart from the money, and the sudden upheaval of plans, while I was driving from Deauville this afternoon I felt myself moved. The country was looking beautiful, the colors were exquisite. It is, after all, my country, and where I belong. The château, heaven knows, is falling to pieces and the grounds are unkept and ragged, but I don't really mind. If you've been born in a place, it does something to you. I neglect it, and curse it, and fight against all that it does to me, just as I curse my mother, for the self-same reason. And yet"—he laughed, and I saw him gesture with his hand—"and yet, driving south from Deauville, I felt I wanted her. In a strange sort of way I missed her, while I was gone. She's a devil and a brute, but I understand her and she understands me, and that's more than you can say, after your seven days."

Suddenly, with geniality, almost with affection, he shook my shoulder.

"Come on," he said, "I don't want to kill you. In many ways I'm grateful for what you've done." He pulled out a wallet—mine. "This will keep you for some considerable time," he said. "At any time you decide upon deception for a few days, I'll be delighted to oblige. What about it? Shall we play charades again now, and start to strip?"

I thought of the curé. I tried to remember what the curé had said. Something about the future, and every day a gift. He was now back in St. Gilles, putting away his tricycle. At the château they were waiting for dinner. They would be wondering where I had gone. Marie-Noël, anxious, perhaps, at my absence, was waiting for me on the terrace. I began to take off my coat.

The exchange of clothes in the darkness was macabre, even terrible. It meant, with every garment shed, a loss of the self I had found. When I stood at last, naked, in front of him, and he had his revolver pointing at me still, I said, "Finish me off, I don't want to live."

"Nonsense," he answered. "No one refuses life. Besides, I don't want to kill you. The point has gone."

He began throwing off his clothes as he spoke, and seeing that I fumbled with them as I put them on, he said, "What have you done to your hand?"

"I burned it," I said. "I burned it in a fire."

"How careless," he said. "Does it mean you're not able to drive the car?"

"No," I said.

"You'd better hand over the dressing. I can't appear without it."

The clothes, that had once been mine, seemed shrunken, small. The suit he had picked from my wardrobe in the flat was one I seldom wore. As I stood before him, dressed and ready, it was like wearing some sort of garment long outgrown, almost as if a man struggled once again into his schoolboy clothes.

He sighed in satisfaction. "That's better," he said. "I feel like myself again." He moved toward the window. "We'd better go out this way," he said. "It's safer. That gossip Julie may be in her lodge. There's another wicked old rascal for you. I suppose you loved her too."

He climbed from the window and I followed him. The scent of the tumbled orchard filled the air. I brushed the vine with my shoulder as I passed.

"I'm sorry," he said, "I shall have to ask you to walk in front of me. The instinct acquired in wartime compels me to walk behind. Go on. I'll direct you to the place where I've left your car."

I stumbled across the orchard and the field. The dark woods closed upon us. Even now it might suit his plan to kill me and have done with me forever. I walked on, through darkness, undergrowth and moss, and now I had no present and no past; the self who stumbled had no heart or mind.

"There's the car," he said suddenly.

The Ford, shabby, familiar, was drawn up beside the forest track. It seemed to me, like my clothes, a phase outgrown. I patted the bonnet with my hand.

"Get in," he said.

I settled myself in the well-known seat, switched on the lights and the ignition.

"Back her out into the track," he said.

He got in beside me and we drove along the path. We turned into the forest road, and so along it to the top of the hill. Below us were the village lights, and the clock struck eight.

"It may not be easy," I said slowly. "They have become different. Your mother, I mean, and Blanche, and Paul, and Renée. Only the child is the same. The child hasn't changed."

He laughed. "Even if she had, she'd soon be mine again. I'm the only one who matters in her world."

We drove down the lime avenue and across the bridge. When I came to the gateway I stopped the car.

"I won't go any farther," I said. "It wouldn't be safe."

He got out and stood for a moment, an animal, sniffing the air. "It's good," he said. "It's part of the place. It's St. Gilles."

Now at last, when all decisions had been taken, he emptied his gun. He put it, with the cartridges, into his pocket.

"Good luck," he said, and then, with a smile, "Listen." He put his two fingers in his mouth and whistled. The sound was shrill and long. It was answered almost instantly by César in his kennel. He began to bark. Not savagely, not as he would do to a stranger, but excitedly, high-pitched, the bark changing to a howl, to a whine. The sound went on and on, filling the air. "You didn't learn that trick?" he asked. "Of course not, how could you know?"

He smiled, and waved his hand, and passed through the gateway on to the drive. Looking toward the terrace steps, I saw a figure waiting there, the glow from the fanlight above the door shining upon her. It was Marie-Noël. When she saw the figure striding up the drive she gave a cry and ran down the steps toward him. I saw him swing her up in his arms and climb the steps. They went inside the château. The dog was whining still. I got into the car and drove away.

What I did was automatic. I don't remember thinking anything. I turned the car up the lime avenue and then to the right, on the road to Villars. I drove cautiously because my injured hand was awkward still, and the part of my brain that was working told me I couldn't afford to make a mistake and risk landing the Ford and myself in a ditch. I concentrated on holding the wheel and watching the road, and the effort of doing so shut out thoughts of anything else.

Coming into Villars was a relief. The country roads held menace: they were nerve cells leading back to St. Gilles. Villars was lighted and had solidity, and people strolling in th streets. I turned down past the market plac and stopped the car just short of the porte d ville. I looked across the canal and saw tha the long window of Béla's room was opene wide onto the balcony, and was lighted to She was at home. When I saw the light, and th open window, something stirred within m that had been frozen since Jean de Gué and had changed clothes in the darkness. The iro clamp was between me and the château, no between me and her. She was outside the tabo The light in her window was consoling, kindl It seemed to stand for reality, too, for th things that were true. It seemed to me tha this was important, to know the false from th true, and I could no longer distinguish betwee either. Béla could tell me. Béla would know.

I left the car and went over the footbridge t the balcony. I walked in through the ope window. The room was empty, but I could hea her moving about in the kitchen. I stood ther waiting, and in a moment she was with me. Sh stood in the doorway, looking at me, and the she shut the door and came toward me.

"I didn't expect you," she said. "If I known you were coming I would have waite dinner for you."

"I'm not hungry," I said. "I don't want an thing."

"You look ill," she said. "Sit down. I'll g you a drink."

I sat down in the deep chair. I did not kno what I was going to say to her. She gave m cognac, and watched me while I drank. T cognac brought some sort of warmth to m but the numbness remained. I felt the solid of the arm of the chair u der my hand, and it w safety.

"Have you been in t mortuary chapel?" sh said.

"No," I said, "no, was there this morning I paused. "Thank you f the porcelain. The chi was pleased. She believe they were the old one mended. It was right of you to sugge that."

"Yes," she said, "I thought it better th way."

She looked at me with compassion. N doubt I seemed to her strained and queer. S must believe I was still shaken by the shock Françoise's death. It might be better to let h think that. Yet I could not be sure. I want something for myself alone.

"I came," I said, "because I was not su when I would see you again."

"I understand," she answered. "Natura the next few days, the next weeks, are goi to be very hard for you."

The next days . . . the next weeks. They c not exist. It was not easy to tell her that.

"The child," she asked, "is she all right?"

"She's been wonderful," I said. "Yes, sh quite all right."

"And your mother?"

"My mother too."

She was still watching me. An odd silen seemed to come between us. I felt I mu justify myself, give her some explanation.

"I want to thank you," I said. "You shown me great understanding all this pa week. I'm very grateful to you."

She did not answer. And suddenly I comprehension come into her eyes, the flash intuition that sweeps an adult hearing the co fession of a child. In a moment she was knel ing by my side. "He has come back then?" s said. "The other one?" I looked at her. She p her hands on my shoulders. "I might ha known it," she said. "He saw the notice in t paper. That brought him back."

Her words gave me such a sense of ov powering relief that all feeling of strain a tension went from me. It was like the stanc ing of a wound, the cessation of pain, t blotting out of fear. I put down the cognac a did something infantile and absurd. I laid m head on her shoulder and closed my eyes.

"Why you?" I asked. "Why you and n body else? Why not the mother, why not t child?"

I felt her hands on my head, soothing, gentle. It was surrender. It was peace.

"I suppose I was not easy to deceive," she said. "I did not realize at first—I could not have told from looking at you, from conversation, any more than they could. It was not till later that I knew."

"What did I do?" I said.

She laughed, and the laugh was not mocking, as it might have been, or easy, or gay, but had a strange quality of warmth, of understanding.

"It was not what you did," she said, "but what you were. A woman would have to be a great fool not to distinguish between one man and another, making love." I felt rebuffed. Yet still I did not mind, because she was with me. "You have something," she said, "that he doesn't possess. That's how I knew."

"What do I have?" I asked.

"You may call it tendresse," she said. "I don't know another word for it." Then abruptly she asked my name.

"John," I said. "We share even that. Shall I tell you what happened?"

"If you want to," she said. "I can guess a great deal. The past is done with, for both of you. The future is what matters now."

"Yes," I said, "but not mine, theirs."

As I said this I knew with urgency, with conviction, that what I was saying was right and true. The old self of Le Mans was dead. The shadow of Jean de Gué had also vanished. In their place was something else that as yet had no substance, no flesh, no blood, but was born of feeling, that could not die, and it was like a flame, contained in the body's shell.

"I love them," I said. "I'm part of them now, forever. That's what I want you to understand. I shall never see them again, but because of them I live."

"I understand," she said, "and it could be the same for them. Because of you they also live."

"If I could believe that," I said, "then nothing matters. Then everything is all right. But he's gone back to them. It's going to be as it was before. It will start all over again—the carelessness, the unhappiness, the suffering, the pain. If that were to happen, I should want to go out now and hang myself on the nearest tree. Even now ——" I stared over her shoulder at the darkness outside the window, and it was as though I stood beside him inside the château, and I saw him smile, and I saw the mother look at him, and the child, and Blanche, and Paul and Renee, and Julie, too, and her son André.

"I want them to be happy," I said. "Not his sort of happiness, but the kind that is buried inside them, locked up, that I know is there. Béla, it exists, I've seen it, like a light or a hunger, waiting to be released."

I stopped, because what I said was perhaps nonsense. I couldn't explain myself. "He's a devil," I said, "and they belong to him again."

"No," she said, "that's where you're wrong. He's not a devil. He's a human, ordinary man, just like yourself."

She rose and drew the curtains, and then came back to me again. "Remember, I know him," she said, "his weakness and his strength, his good points and his bad. If he were a devil I shouldn't waste my time here in Villars. I should have left him long ago."

I wanted to believe her, but I could not be sure, when a woman loves a man, how true is her judgment. To see no evil could be the one blindness. Little by little I told her what I knew, the bits and pieces of the past I had put together during the week that had gone. Some of it she knew already; some of it she guessed. Yet as I talked, wishing to condemn him, it was as if it was the shadow I condemned, the man who had moved and spoken and acted in his place, and not Jean de Gué at all.

"It's no use," I said at last. "I'm not describing the man you know."

"You are," she answered, "but you're describing yourself as well."

There was the fear. Which one of us was real? Who lived, and who had died? It struck me suddenly that if I should now look at myself in a mirror I should see no reflection.

"Béla," I said, "hold me. Tell me my name."

"You are John," she said, "you are John, who changed places with Jean de Gué. You lived his life for a week. You came here twice to my house and you loved me as John, not as Jean de Gué. Is that reality for you? Does that help you to become yourself?"

I touched her hair and her face and her hands, and there was no falsity about her, no pretense.

"You've given something to all of us," she said—"to me, to his mother, to his sister, to his child. Just now I called it tendresse. Whatever it is, it can't be destroyed. It's taken root. It will go on growing. In future we shall look for you in Jean, not for Jean in you." She smiled, and put her hands on my shoulders. "Do you realize I know nothing about you?" she said. "I don't know where you come from, or where you are going, or anything at all except that your name is John."

"There is no more to know," I said. "Let's leave it at that."

"If he hadn't come back," she asked, "what was he going to do?"

"He was going to travel," I told her. "He was going to take you with him. Or so he said. Would you have gone?"

She did not answer at once. For the first time she seemed nonplused. "He's been my lover for three years," she said. "He's familiar, part of my daily existence. I believe he's fond of me. But he would soon find someone else."

"No," I said. "He would never find anyone else."

"What makes you so sure of that?"

"You forget," I said. "I've lived his life for a week."

I looked at the window and the curtain she had drawn across it.

"Why did you draw the curtain?" I asked.

"It's a signal," she said. "He doesn't come in when it's drawn. It means I'm not alone."

The same thought, then, had come to both of us. Once he had dined, and said bon soir to the child, and left his mother in the tower room alone, he might go down to the car once again, and drive from St. Gilles to Villars, and cross the footbridge as I had done. He belonged here, just as he did there. He was the man in possession, I the intruder.

"Béla," I said, "he doesn't know I've been here. He need never know, unless it comes out through Gaston, which is unlikely. Keep it from him, if you can."

I got up from the chair. She said, "What are you going to do?"

"Leave the house," I answered, "before he comes. If I know anything of him, he'll need you tonight."

She looked at me thoughtfully. "I could leave the curtain drawn," she said.

When she said this I remembered what he had done to me. I remembered how he had not only taken up his own life once again, but had destroyed the one that had been mine. I no longer had a job, or a roof in London, or anything that belonged to me but a suit of clothes, and the Ford, and a wallet containing some French money.

"I asked you a question a moment ago," I said to her, "but you never answered it. I asked if you would have gone with him, traveling, had he suggested it."

"I suppose so," she said, "if I felt he wanted me."

"It would have been a sudden plan," I said, "without much warning. Remember, he couldn't have shown himself in Villars, in case he was recognized."

"He wouldn't have come to Villars," she said. "He would have written to me, or telegraphed, or even telephoned, asking me to join him."

"And you would have gone?"

She hesitated for one brief moment. "Yes," she said, "yes, I should have gone."

I glanced at the window. "Pull the curtain back when I've left the house," I said. "I'll go down the stairs and through the door to the street."

She followed me out of the room to the passage beyond. "What about your hand?"

"My hand?"

"It has no dressing."

She went to the bathroom and fetched an oilskin packet, similar to the one she had used on Sunday. As she held my hand, and dressed it, I thought of Blanche, who had done the same for me in the morning, and I thought of the mother, whose hand had lain in mine throughout the night. I remembered, too, the firm, warm clasp of the child.

"Look after them," I said. "You can do it, but nobody else. Perhaps he'll listen to you. Help him to love them."

"He loves them already," she said. "I want you to believe it. It wasn't just the money that brought him back."

"I wonder," I said. "I wonder."

When she had dressed my hand and I was ready to leave, she said to me, "Where are you going? What are you going to do?"

"I have a car outside," I answered, "the one he took from me a week ago. The one he would have driven you in, to Sicily or Greece."

She came with me down the stairs, and standing there, at the dark entrance to the shop, she paused a moment before opening the barred door and letting me out into the night. In a troubled voice she said, "You're not going to harm yourself in any way? You haven't said to yourself, 'This is the end'?"

"No," I said, "it isn't the end. It may be the beginning."

She drew back the bolts from the door. "A week ago," I told her, "I was a man named John, who didn't know what to do with failure. I thought of a place I might go to, to find out. Then I met Jean de Gué, and went to St. Gilles instead."

"And now you are John again," she answered, "but you don't have to worry about failure. It doesn't exist for you any more. You learned what to do with failure at St. Gilles."

"I didn't learn what to do with it," I said, "it merely became transformed. It turned into love for St. Gilles. So the problem remains the same. What do I do with love?"

She opened the door. The shops and houses opposite were shuttered and closed. There was nobody in the street.

"You give it away," she said, "but the trouble is, it stays with you just the same. Like water in a well. The spring remains, under the dried depths." She put her arms round me and kissed me. "Will you write to me?" she asked.

"I expect so."

"And you know where you're going?"

"I know where I'm going."

"Will you be there long?"

"I've no idea."

"This place, is it far away?"

"Oddly enough no. Only about fifty kilometers."

"If they could have shown you there what to do with failure, can they also show you what to do with love?"

"I believe so. I believe they'll give me the answer you've given me now."

I kissed her, and then I went out into the street. I heard her shut the door and bolt it behind me. I went under the porte de ville, and climbed into the car, and reached for my maps. They were where I had left them, in the pocket beside the driver's seat. I found the route I had marked with a blue cross a week ago. The road would take me to the Forêt de la Trappe and to the abbey after leaving Mortagne. I might be able to get there in not more than an hour, or an hour and a half.

I put down the map, and glancing up at her window I saw that she had pulled the curtain back once more. The light was shining from the window down to the canal and the footbridge. I backed the car, and turned and went up the avenue, and as I passed the hospital I saw the Renault drawn up beside the pavement. It was not outside the hospital entrance, but by the smaller gate, leading to the mortuary chapel. It was empty, and there was no sign of Gaston. Whoever had come in the car had gone in to pay tribute alone.

I drove to the network of roads at the top of the town, turned left and took the road to Bellême and Mortagne. END

DOROTHY HARPER ▲

By all medical logic Dorothy Harper should have died nine years ago. Yet today she does all her own work, looks after her four children, and works as a photographer's model. Uterine cancer is one of the most curable if caught in time, yet 34,000 women develop it each year—and only 5000 live.

These 7 were Saved

Cancer is a disease of time.
These seven are now alive and well because they acted before time had run out.

By PATRICIA

Last year 250,000 Americans were killed by cancer. This is certainly a tragic fact. But more tragic still is the truth that at least 75,000 of these men, women and children died needlessly. The medicines, hospitals, surgeons were ready and waiting to save them. But these 75,000 never came, or they came too late.

For cancer is a disease of time. These are the stories of seven who acted before time had run out. They are alive and well.

In the last fifteen years over $150,000,000 has been spent for cancer research. These seven histories tell how you may profit from that research and the knowledge it has uncovered.

SID AVERY

▲ ARTHUR COE

Arthur Coe felt perfectly healthy except for an annoying small sore on his lip. But his doctor said, "Arthur, I'll tell you right out, that's cancer." Every year 3500 Americans die of skin cancer, the most curable of all.

"The funny thing," says young Ruth Namiat, "is that I hadn't noticed it before. It seemed to be there suddenly and without warning. On the side of my right breast there was a lump, the size—the doctor said—of an olive. I don't know just how to describe it. You couldn't see it. But you could feel it. It was movable, and harder and firmer than the tissue around it."

Mrs. Namiat is an attractive 33, dark-haired, tan and healthy, the mother of two young sons.

"I didn't feel sick at all," she added. "Robert was five then, and Alan was just a year old. That kept me working hard, but I felt just fine."

Mrs. Namiat's husband, Sam, urged her to go to her family doctor, and she did. The doctor was very matter-of-fact. He couldn't say whether it was malignant or not. Two out of three breast lumps are not. "A surgeon will have to make a biopsy," he explained: "take a piece of the tissue and examine it under the microscope. This is the only way we can be certain."

Ruth Namiat didn't react at first. "But I had an hour's ride home on the train," she says, "and I started thinking—about Sam and the boys, about how young I was. By the time I got home I was hysterical, really hysterical with fear."

That was on a Tuesday. Thursday she saw a specialist at New York's Memorial Hospital. He made an appointment for surgery.

"While you are asleep on the operating table the doctor takes a biopsy specimen, and they send the specimen to the lab."

These quick studies are made by the frozen-section method. A bit of tissue is taken from the tumor. It is quick-frozen at once, sliced into extremely thin sections, and studied under the microscope. In a few minutes the report goes to the operating room. If it is positive, the surgeons remove the tumor, together with a great deal of the surrounding tissue.

"I had to sign a paper," says Mrs. Namiat, "consenting to both the biopsy and the operation, if the latter proved necessary."

JOSEPH DI PIETRO

Tuesday morning Ruth Namiat went into the operating room. Twenty-four hours later she awoke. "I knew what had happened before they told me," she says. "My whole right side ached, and I knew what they had had to do."

Mrs. Namiat's operation was a radical mastectomy. Her right breast was removed, and the surrounding tissue all the way to the lymph glands under the right arm. Cancer surgery must often be radical. The rapidly growing, disordered cells invade everywhere. To hope for a cure, the surgeons must remove every last cell.

"In eight days I was home," Ruth Namiat continues. "My mother had been taking care of the children, and she went on helping out. I couldn't raise my right arm much at all. It was some time before I could use it normally, though for many women it's just a couple of weeks.

"Each day I stood facing the wall, painfully walking my fingers upward, trying to bring my arm a fraction of an inch higher. It wasn't easy, but I was so grateful to be alive.

"Even so, the first year was pretty hard. It wasn't just the discomfort. It was my vanity, I guess. That sort of thing isn't easy for a young woman to accept. And yet, a little blow to the vanity is such a small price to pay for your life."

Ruth Namiat acted in time. "But," one surgeon points out, "she discovered her cancer by accident. Had she examined her breasts properly, every month, she would have found the lump when it was much smaller."

Every year some 52,000 American women develop cancer of the breast. It is the most common cancer among women, and every year over 22,000 women die of this cancer, many of them because it was not detected in time.

RUTH NAMIAT ▶

Ruth Namiat "didn't feel sick at all," saw her doctor only because of her husband's urging. One week later she went into the operating room for the mastectomy which saved her life. An estimated 70 per cent are curable, yet last year 22,000 women died of cancer of the breast.

and RON DEUTSCH

Not all breast cancer is curable. But experts think that 70 per cent of this cancer's victims should live. The American Cancer Society has a pamphlet which shows you how to examine your breast for breast cancer. It has a film on this subject, too, which you may see by calling the local unit of the society.

Many women mistakenly believe that a lump is the only warning sign. It is the only early sign as a rule. But there are other later signals: changes in the shape of the breast or an elevation of it, dimpling or puckering of the skin, changes or irritations of the nipple.

Ruth Namiat knows these things now, and looks for them. "I didn't know until later," she says, "but while I was in the hospital my mother discovered a similar lump in her breast. I'll never understand why, but she told no one. It was a year and a half before she saw a doctor. She was operated on too late."

At 75, Arthur Coe is a small, spry man who looks years younger. When at 65 he was retired by the Los Angeles Department of Water and Power, he went right back to work as a father. "We put up the wood framework that you plaster over," he says, "and I worked at it for two years before I had any trouble."

Mr. Coe's trouble was a small sore spot on the right side of his lower lip. It was annoying, but he felt perfectly healthy otherwise. "I put some ointments and washes on it," says Catherine Coe, "but they didn't seem to do much good."

In a few weeks the sore had become scaly, and then it began to open. Coe was certain it was "just a cold sore." But it had come just where he held nails between his lips. "It began to hurt so I couldn't hold the nails any more," he says, "and I figured we'd take a little vacation we'd planned, and let it heal."

"I wasn't at all sure about that," says Catherine Coe. "I got a magnifying glass, and it looked kind of festering and raw inside, and the raw place kept growing. I told him to go to the doctor, but he wouldn't."

Arthur Coe's "cold sore" continued its inexorable growth. It began to weep a little, and his lip became tender, began to interfere somewhat with his eating. When the Coes returned home, Arthur went to see the doctor.

The doctor studied the sore and said, "Arthur, I'll tell you right out that's cancer."

"I wasn't scared," says Coe. "The doctor said he was pretty sure it could be cured, and made an appointment with a specialist for the next day. The specialist took a look, and made a test. Then he took a picture of it and put me on a table. They lowered a big, heavy mask over my face, with a little hole in it that fit over the sore. I just lay there a few minutes, then I went home."

The mask over Arthur Coe's face was protecting him against the low-voltage X rays aimed at the cancer on his lip. Five times more he went back to the table. "After the sixth treatment," says Coe, "I went back, and the doctor looked at it, and he said, 'I think that's got it.'"

That was in 1948. Two years later Arthur Coe had only a small subdued scar on his lower lip. But beneath a dental bridge on his upper jaw Coe began to feel a soreness. Catherine Coe examined the area, and saw a small whitish, raw patch on the gum. "I think it's back," she said.

Coe went directly to the cancer specialist, who, on examination, made arrangements for Coe to be admitted to St. Vincent's Hospital. "He'd done all right before," Coe says, "so I didn't even ask any questions. Two days later they wheeled me into an operating room for minor surgery and that's all I knew for a couple hours. Two days later I was home, and after a couple of weeks the soreness was all gone."

Arthur Coe still sees his doctor every six months, a common-sense precaution for any man his age to take. And he recognizes that in his story there is a quiet drama. For these simple procedures were a battle for his life.

It is not hard to see a skin cancer in time or cancer of the lip or mouth. It is not hidden. Skin cancer appears usually on the exposed parts of the body. It starts usually as a scaly patch, a sore, a pimple or a blister. Home remedies will not affect it, and it usually becomes an open sore, a sore that will not heal. Three weeks, say the experts, is time enough to give such a blemish. Then see your doctor.

HOW IMPORTANT IS BREAST FEEDING?

Where nursing remains unpleasant or painful the reason is usually an ingrained feeling of disgust and guilt. In a few cases these attitudes are intense and clear-cut. More often they are mild and unconscious and then they merely decrease the pleasure of nursing and the enthusiasm for it.

Somewhat similar to disgust is a feeling of shame about the use of the breasts for nursing, because of the other connotations they have. In many parts of the world, including "civilized" regions, the breasts are thought of primarily for nursing and women feel little embarrassment in nursing a baby even in public. But in America, partly perhaps because of the decline in breast feeding but probably also for other less obvious reasons, the breasts seem to have come to be thought of primarily as objects of attractiveness, to be noticed, to be featured in dress, talked about, joked about. This strong emphasis on the appeal of breasts probably helps to make nursing an embarrassing matter for women who are more modest or self-conscious than average. They anticipate difficulty in finding sufficient privacy to nurse at certain times, and even dread slightly the prospect of having to refer to it in conversation. This detracts from the desire to nurse and from the ease and pleasure with which it is done. Is there anything that can be done about the occasional problems of disgust and shame? There has certainly been a steady trend away from prudishness in the past fifty years. Most American children being brought up nowadays are allowed to feel comfortable and friendly toward their bodies. This has probably played a part in the recent increased enthusiasm for breast feeding and will do still more in the future. A woman whose overly strong sense of disgust or shame is a serious problem (interfering, for instance, with her marital adjustment) can get help from a psychiatrist. But meanwhile I would not urge a woman who could not easily overcome such feelings to nurse against her wishes.

Jealousy comes more from self-love than from true love. LA ROCHEFOUCAULD

The attitudes of friends and relatives will affect the inexperienced young woman. If they believe in breast feeding, it helps her tremendously in feeling that it's the natural thing to do and that she'll make a go of it. But the fact is that in many American communities today breast feeding, instead of being the regular, the accepted way to feed a baby, has become the unusual method. Normal everyday people quite naturally prefer to do the usual thing, to be like everyone else, unless there is a special reason against it. So in some families and in some towns a woman has to be ready to admit she is different if she nurses, ready to answer questions and even arguments. Breast feeding has acquired a reputation—which I don't think it should have—of being difficult to succeed at. A mother trying it for the first time usually has a few friends who have tried and given up. Unfortunately, a surprising proportion of the women who have failed seem determined to persuade the new mother that she can't succeed, either, and that she ought to stop. Such attitudes are hard for a sensitive woman to ignore. But I believe myself that if she knows ahead of time what she may be up against, she'll be less bothered when the arguments come.

To sum up the problem of the attitudes that discourage nursing, it seems to me that there is not a great deal that we professional people and other enthusiasts can do or should do directly to persuade reluctant expectant mothers, aside from showing our belief in it and correcting misconceptions. Some of the doubters will come around to a positive attitude later in pregnancy. Those who don't change their minds know their own feelings and we'd better respect them, not just to be polite but for the benefit of mother and baby.

There is reason to hope that some of the adverse attitudes will weaken because of the trends of the times.

I believe that the greatest contribution of the doctors and nurses will come in helping those mothers who already want to nurse to accomplish it more easily and more often, in the hospital and especially on getting home. If in that way we can gain a higher percentage of successes, it may in turn change attitudes somewhat. I want to discuss the possibilities in another article.

Although he cannot answer letters personally, Dr. Spock will be glad to hear from readers and will discuss in these pages problems of general interest.—Ed.

years. By that time he hoped to have made enough money to retire to something more interesting than business.

Rutledge continued: "You probably know that our original unit, the rolling mill, began as the century did. Their annual sales were about seventy-five thousand dollars. This year our whole operation isn't a great deal less than several thousand times that in fifty countries. Yet in another sense we've always remained a small company. We've grown, if I may say so, like a tree from our own strength."

This last firmly held article of faith was not wholly true. The growth had of course come largely from consolidations with and purchases of other companies, yet, in the sense Rutledge intended, it was true. The founder had been a man of deep social consciousness, aware, as few of his generation had been, of responsibilities toward the community for the safety of its labor at work and for every man's right to better himself.

"You'll find us very conservative about the way to do business and you'll find us as daring as a pure scientist about new ways to improve a product or reduce a cost or junk an obsolete machine. If, as I suppose, you have investigated us as we have you, you may feel our policies haven't been too unsuccessful." He said it with a pleased and almost boyish smile. "Now do this for me if you will. I have been rather curious about it. Just sketch for me the sort of business day, I mean a typical day, in your Government position."

"Well, I arrive at the office a little before nine and read the cables from Washington," Lowry told him.

"Now what would they be about? I'm not asking for Government secrets."

"I've served in six European and Near East countries since 1946, and of course the cables vary according to the host country, as we call it. But they follow a general pattern. Washington will cable authority to let the host country purchase hand pumps for an environmental sanitation project, provided bidding is open to U. S. suppliers and that procurement procedure follows agreed-upon standards, something which we will already have told them has been agreed. The next will tell us that the program recommendations for next year must be ready in a week. This will be in reply to a question from us asking for policy guide lines, which of course they will disregard."

"You mean that sort of thing happens under the present administration?"

"They're much alike," Lowry said.

"That's very interesting, very. Go on, tell me more."

Lowry smiled. "Well, the bombs really start bursting in air when one says that a constituent of a senator, from any state you like, has written him about personally seeing U. S. fertilizer soaking up rain in an open freight car in the middle of a famine area. We are ordered to see the Minister of Agriculture forthwith, direct him to cease and desist from

"Very glad you did," Rutledge said heartily. "Mrs. Cramer with you?"

"No, mother decided not to come on from the West at this time. Our boy is just back from Korea and I'll be with them for New Year's in the morning. Great joy to us to have him back safely."

"I know it must be," Rutledge said.

Cramer smiled and said he must get to his train and after he had shaken hands again with Mr. Lowry, Rutledge walked to the door with him.

"Awfully nice of you to stop in this way. I do appreciate it. My love to your family," Rutledge said and, when Cramer had gone, turned back to Lowry to say, "Now that was a characteristically nice thing of Cramer. He's a remarkable man."

"Is he in the company?"

"No. We met him . . . oh, twenty years ago when his firm was our auditors; and then in the thirties the Founders Trust put him in a variety of shaky situations, all of which he got back on their feet, made a great reputation. We got him for our engine company in Illinois at one time. He's an industrial adviser to a number of important banks and corporations, but it's never gone to his head." He glanced at his watch. There was a great deal more he wanted to ask Lowry. "Tell me," Rutledge said; "you went in the Army in 1940, I understand, and from there straight into Foreign Service?"

"Yes."

"What did you do before that? I've got some record of it, but just refresh my memory."

"I graduated from college in '34 and did various things for five years, none of them very well."

"What were they?"

"You will recall," Lowry replied, "that it was a little hard at the time to get any job, much less settle on your lifework?"

"I do," Rutledge said with a smile. "There's been quite a change. I understand now that 'leading industrialists' sit at 'round tables' over 'the problem of attracting the bright young men who will become the business leaders of tomorrow.' I haven't come to that, but we're always interested in talent. However, about you. Who attracted you?"

"I was in a publisher's for a year. I drove a truck for the Loyalist Relief in Spain for two years and I was in the foreign department of the Founders Trust just before I went in the Army."

"I see," Rutledge said. Well, it could have been worse, but offhand it was not very impressive. Still, let's see—three years out, a boy, of, say, twenty-five or so, he did see the light and went in a bank. St. Paul was older than that before he saw it on the road to Damascus. Henry Ford was a failure for a good many years. "By the way, you're married, as I recall?"

"Oh, yes; three children."

Despite some reservations, Rutledge was inclined to go ahead. Unquestionably Lowry would broaden the organization and Rutledge was aware that uniformity was as dangerous in a business as complacency. And he must essentially be the right man or there would not be a folder of letters from important men saying that he was. And it was getting late.

"I haven't told you very much of what you'd do here, don't think it's necessary," Rutledge said. "We simply want our whole foreign operation headed up. I suppose we'd both better think it over, but I'd say that I'm ninety-nine per cent ready to go ahead. How do you feel?"

"I'd like to know something more about the general setup and the other men at what would be my level."

"Good question," Rutledge said, getting up and going over to draw an organization chart down from a rack on the wall. "Our subsidiaries are almost entirely autonomous except for foreign sales. Their financial supervision, as you see, is under Charley Curtis, our treasurer and senior vice-president. Operations under Calvin Hewitt. Leslie Evans has engineering—in broad terms: design, plants, new models. An outstanding man. There, as you see, Jim Peale has been spread too thin—an eye on the foreign business as well as progress and development. Expansion, in other words. New fields, diversification. All of them men you'll like. That enough?"

"Yes, for the moment."

"The assistant vice-presidents you'll get to know," Rutledge told him. "The new head of our foreign business will be on the same level as these other men. The board set thirty-five thousand as his start-off salary. Henry Dennison told me he explained the management pool to you, and our stock-option plan. We haven't made a lot of millionaires here, but on the other hand—well, a man can make a decent living and have something to look forward to."

They both smiled at the magnificent understatement.

"Right now," Rutledge went on, "some of the men who have been with us as little as five years have a very handsome paper profit in their options, though of course you never know how the market will turn. Oh, there are two small formalities: physical examination; and I know you won't take this other one amiss, but we ask a man coming in at your level to give us a complete statement of his affairs. I'm the only one, literally the only one to see it. All officers make such a report to me at the year's end. You can see the reason for doing it at the start."

Lowry said he did and would be glad to comply. Rutledge went over to his closet for his hat and coat.

"You leave your things at the door?"

"I didn't have any," Lowry said.

The thing is not as absolutely clear-cut as I'd like it to be, Rutledge thought. There was one person on whose judgment of men he had come greatly to rely. "Look here," he said, "Mrs. Rutledge is waiting for me in the car downstairs and we're going to the Waldorf for a drink. It's an annual practice of ours and there's a story connected with it may interest you. We went there, just by chance, a New Year's Eve afternoon in the late thirties. As it happened, one of the Austrian Rothschilds had landed here as a refugee that morning and as we were having our drink he came in with two gorillas if I ever saw one." He had turned to face Lowry and suddenly stopped dead in the story. "Well, no matter," he said in evident embarrassment.

Lowry, puzzled, said, "Oh, come, tell me the rest."

"No, no, just forget it. What I was going to suggest was that you come along with us."

"Are you still suggesting it?" Lowry asked with a grin.

"Yes, I'd like you to meet Mrs. Rutledge," he said and then began to laugh. "Oh, I'll have to tell you. The fact is I've had great confidence in her opinions since that day; in business, I mean—always had it in other things. Rothschild sat down at a table with these gorillas and they proceeded to go to work on him. He was pale, droopy and exhausted. You could just see these two confidence men taking him over and I said to my wife, 'That's a pathetic sight.' 'It certainly is,' she said; 'in an hour Rothschild'll have their shirts.' I want to see what she thinks of you."

"I'll be delighted, but my wife's also waiting for me at the hotel."

"Well, fine, we'll pick her up too."

"Couldn't Mrs. Rutledge and you come to us? They've given us a sitting room. Why don't you do that, unless Rothschild's waiting for you?" Lowry asked.

It was not a bad idea. Seeing Mrs. Lowry as hostess, even in a hotel sitting room, Mrs. Rutledge could make a very clear assessment. They went down to the car after leaving greetings and a handclasp with Titcomb, who sprinted ahead to relieve Rutledge of the need of ringing for an elevator.

Mrs. Rutledge, bundled in furs and smelling of flowers, was waiting in a limousine.

"Susan," Rutledge said, "this is Mr. Lowry I told you about and he's asked us to go up to the hotel where they're staying for a drink and I said we'd love to. Mrs. Lowry is there. Is that all right?"

"Why, darling, of course, how delightful. Get in next to me, Mr. Lowry, before you freeze. Here, take half the robe. What would your mother say if she saw you without a coat in this weather?"

Rosalie Lowry, the water running for her bath, did not hear the telephone ring when her husband called from the lobby to tell her he had arrived and that Mr. and Mrs. Rutledge were with him.

He took them up to what Mrs. Rutledge thought was a very homelike sitting room for a hotel. There was domestic amenity: two vases of flowers and a half-dozen new books on the table and desk; a leather traveling frame with pictures of two young boys and a younger sister; the framed photograph of a handsome man, another evidently of the hostess, sun bathing on a beach. But a pleasant disorder went with it: a pile of laundered shirts and some shopping items half opened; letters and cards, some still unopened.

He put away their coats, settled them comfortably, went into the bedroom, and as he closed the door behind him they heard a shower running.

The sight of his wife unclothed or clothed had continuously waylaid Lowry for almost twelve years. He stared appreciatively at her standing in the tub as she gasped with surprise and cold water, and turned her back.

"'Good afternoon, sir,'" Lowry said. "The Rutledges are outside waiting for a drink."

"Oh, good," she said, turning off the water and stepping out. "Then it went well? You think it's settled?"

"Oh, I think so. How long will you be?"

She took off her shower cap and shook out her pale bronze hair. "Just a few minutes. Is she silks or tweeds?"

"Silks."

"That blue thing be all right?"

"Perfect."

"I'll hurry. What's he like?"

"Very nice. Earnest but nice about it."

"My wife will be here in just a moment. She's delighted you could come," Lowry said to the Rutledges as he asked the operator for room service.

"Is this your wife?" Mrs. Rutledge asked, picking up the photograph of the barely covered sun bather. Her husband had spotted it as soon as Lowry had left the room. He had been of two minds about it: that Mrs. Lowry, having no warning of their arrival, had had no chance to put it away; but it was not the sort of picture which in his view you left around for waiters and bellhops to gape at.

Lowry nodded as he ordered some champagne.

"How perfectly lovely she is. And these are the children? Are they here?"

"No, they're in school abroad."

"Mrs. Lowry an American girl?" Rutledge asked.

"No, Estonian."

When Lowry crossed the room to admit the waiter, his wife entered from the bedroom. She wore a blue velvet hostess gown and her actual looks startled Rutledge more than the picture had. She was beautiful, rather tall, with a manner all easy cordiality.

"We were admiring your lovely children," Mrs. Rutledge said. "When do they join you?"

"Not until summer. They're in school in Switzerland. My brother"—she pointed to the photograph of the handsome man—"and his wife are having an eye on them. We feel that much as we'd miss them, getting a place to live would be so difficult, to say nothing of the right schools, that they'd better stay."

"We also thought it would be fun to be alone for a while," Lowry said.

There was that word "fun" again, Rutledge thought. At the same time he assessed the large sapphire ring and diamond clip his hostess was wearing and they gave him a comfortable feeling that Lowry had "private means."

"You've been in America before, of course," he said to Mrs. Lowry.

"No, I haven't. Stephen has been back frequently, but the difficulty and expense of moving young children about led me to stay with them."

Rutledge turned to Stephen. "I'm curious, Lowry, as to why you stayed so long in Europe. You'd more than paid the debt we all owe our country several years ago, I should have thought." Actually he was a little more than curious. He was a little troubled lest Lowry might be one of those voluntary expatriates who did not think the American scene cultured enough for them. He was not looking for a man like that.

"I sometimes think it was because of the flowers," Rosalie said.

If he had heard correctly, Mrs. Lowry had now said something which really disturbed him. Of course he was fond of flowers himself

PARADISE

As early as 3000 B.C., gardens were highly prized in the hot, dry Near East. Frequently a wall was built around a particularly fertile spot adjacent to a rich man's home. Such a cool, green retreat was a mark of easy, cultured living—far more significant than the modern patio with barbecue pit.

From terms for "around" and "heap," a watered clump of fruit trees surrounded on all sides by heaps of stones was given a special name. Eventually it took the form pairidaeza. Prominent in sacred literature of several peoples, the term for a walled garden entered modern speech as paradise.

Most of us are familiar with some sort of tension and know what it does to us emotionally.

What many women may not realize is that tension can also lead to the premature loss of beauty. To the atrophy of facial skin, the forming of fine tight "worry" lines and deep cutaneous wrinkles.

One excellent restorative is the result of intensive medical and scientific research. It is a fine hormone cream to be used nightly... Endocreme.

Nothing can match the hormone cream in sheer effectiveness, in its ability to return youthful moistures to the skin... moistures which act to offset the physical effects of tension.

Not only does Endocreme work effectively it works swiftly... a dramatic change can be seen in even one week. Texture becomes softer, smoother. Color fresher and clearer. Lines start to fade and little hollows at cheek and chin fill in. A tense, harried look replaced by a young and luminous glow.

Endocreme is a marvelous substance to work with, rich and soothing to the touch. It is an "active" beauty agent containing lanolin, lipoids, and exclusive Activol (natural selected estrogens).

Try Endocreme for one month... see for yourself how effective it is. Enjoy fresher, younger beauty for many years to come.

Endocreme restores fresh young beauty most effectively

Endocreme, the original hormone cream, was perfected by a medical research team which included an eminent endocrinologist and dermatologist.

Today, after 15 years Endocreme is still the overwhelming choice of women who reflect poised, mature beauty. Ask for, and accept nothing less than Endocreme.

Annual flower-show prizes to him were proof of that.

"I think that's the most delightful reason," Mrs. Rutledge said, "and I know exactly what you mean."

"In my view," Rutledge said, "the street-corner vendors of flowers you see all over Europe are the direct result of the general low standard of living and the general obsolescence of their industry. You'd agree with me on that, Lowry?"

"I'd agree that the product of flower sales won't buy many cars or TVs," Lowry said.

"Do you like New York, Mrs. Lowry?" Rutledge asked her.

"It's very exciting. The great office buildings around Rockefeller Center make me speechless with awe. Please don't think I'm being critical of my new country when I say the lack of trees and parks also makes me speechless for another reason."

"Oh, come, we have parks. Look out your window," Rutledge said.

"But there's only one. I made Stephen take me around. We saw Washington and Stuyvesant squares, and we saw Gramercy, but"—she shook her head—"they are not as beautiful as they should be."

"Well, we have a very mixed population in New York, lots of vandalism in the parks. They come out in droves in the spring and tear down my dogwoods and lilacs."

"They wouldn't," Mrs. Lowry replied, "if New York had city parks like those not only in Paris or London or Rome but in all the little countries, like my own along the Baltic."

Rutledge had had to deal with a wide variety of difficulties raised by wives of new associates. But there was something disturbingly foreign about a woman making an issue of flowers and parks. At the same time, she seemed to be a sensible enough woman. Mrs. Rutledge was asking her about the capitals Lowry had been posted to and she was talking freely, easily, without any name dropping.

"We're a rather closely knit family at C. I. C.," Rutledge heard his wife saying, "and I'm sure you'll like most of the wives."

"I can only hope they'll like me," Mrs. Lowry replied so modestly that Rutledge forgot about parks and flowers. Obviously she intended to "enter in." He realized that the long training in tact and adjustment which she had as the wife of a Government official would be most valuable.

"New York is the most friendly city in the world," he said; "that's what you'll find."

Mrs. Lowry half turned her head. "In Paris," she said, "the gendarmes shake hands when they meet. The bus drivers lean out to shake hands when they pull up beside each other. Small children shake hands when they're through playing in the parks. Concierges ——"

"That's not real friendliness. That's affectation," Rutledge replied. "Have you any clubs, Lowry?"

"Only Yale nonresident, I'm afraid."

"Well, we'll take care of that. The University and the Hounds are the natural places for you at present, and I'm a governor of one and Jim Peale of the other."

Lowry smiled. "Jim Peale is my oldest friend."

"Now I never knew that. Why in the world didn't he say something?"

"I asked him not to," Lowry replied. "There's a rule my father taught me: 'Make friends through business but don't go in business with your friends.'"

"That's very well put, very. What did your father do?" Rutledge asked. He was very pleased. This was a man with his head on the right way.

"He had the Lowry Equipment Company in Ohio."

"Oh, of course, I remember."

The telephone rang and Lowry said, "I think that's the Peales now. They're dining with us."

"I'm actually shaking," Mrs. Lowry said to Mrs. Rutledge. "I've never met either of them."

"You'll like them."

Lowry hung up the telephone and hurried out to the elevator to receive them. His wife stood anxiously waiting, hoping, almost praying that she would find favor in the eyes of the man, reunion with whom meant so much to her husband. They had been like brothers through school and college and now in the prime of their lives, after long separation, there could be a renewal, a deepening of all the ties of comradeship. She would like Peale whatever he was, if only he liked her and did not feel that Lowry had thrown away his life by his illogical, impetuous marriage.

Then the three blew in to and with gay greetings, and a cheery scolding from Rutledge for not having told him. Peale came straight to her, arms extended. She was aware of his good looks, his athletic figure, perhaps a trifle too straight and erect.

"I should have been there to have done this at your wedding," he said, kissing her. She laughed and kissed him.

"Oh, I'm so glad," she said.

"Lucky man," Mrs. Rutledge said.

"It's our wedding anniversary," Lowry told her.

"How do you like him, Edward?" Peale asked Rutledge.

"How can he help it?" Evelyn Peale asked, looking up at Lowry. She was dark and slight, tired-looking but effusive as befitted the occasion.

"Don't know about him. Like his wife. That's enough. Well, all good things come to an end, and we must be off," Rutledge said.

Down in the elevator, out to their car and in it, Mrs. Rutledge was bubbling with enthusiasm over the Lowrys. Rutledge had fallen silent.

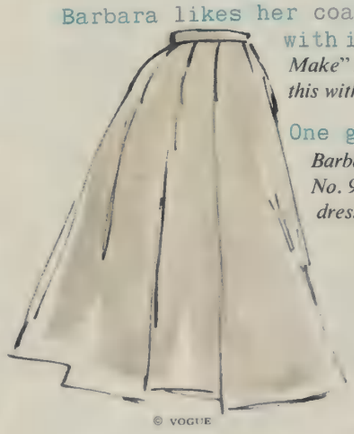
"Darling, what's the matter?" she asked. "Why didn't you kiss your hostess? You were the best-looking man there."

He took her ungloved hand under the robe. "I don't know," he said. "I suddenly feel rather depressed."

"Why, dear, how unlike you. You liked them, didn't you?"

Special Additions in How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing!

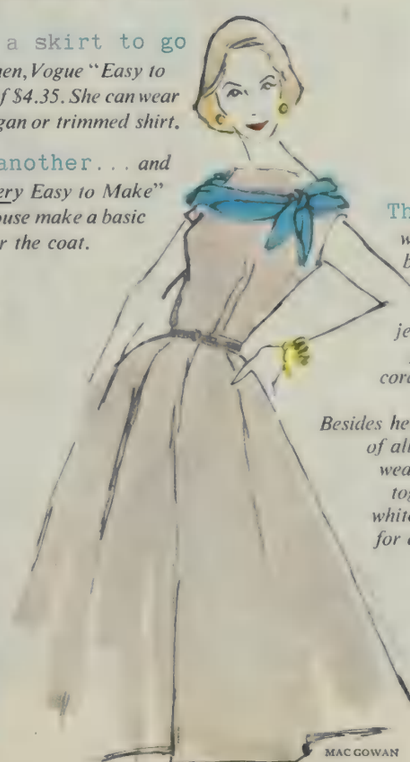
By BET HART



Barbara J. is undecided (but only momentarily) about her new purchase for spring and the future—a coat. Her thinking, before she buys, follows along these lines: The coat must go over practically everything in her wardrobe (and prettily too), including purchases from last season she will wear now. Also, Barbara has absolutely no intentions of buying new accessories even for such an important purchase as this! This means the coat must be worn with her black pumps, her beige clutch bag and black carryall, and either one or both of her hats—remember her satin head clip and beige beret? . . . We say Barbara hesitates momentarily, only because her fashion calculating is clear and sure—very heartening for those of us who procrastinate about such things. And in this case, Barbara goes directly to her fashion find. She sees a coat, tries it—and buys it. (We admit she looks around afterward just to make doubly sure she has found the best fashion buy!) The coat is in a lovely beige rayon tweed flecked with white, fully lined and boasting a row of brass buttons. The price: a wonderful $17.95. Barbara looks to the future and decides that on the first trip to the cleaner's she will have it waterproofed—the perfect solution for wear on damp days in spring and summer as well as sunny ones!

PRIGENT

Barbara about to leave the office for the day. Her new coat worn over her (unseen) blue wool dress from last month. Her not-so-new accessories—beige clutch bag, black pumps and white gloves—do have a new spring polish. Her turquoise scarf is a gay accent for the beige, but equally practical against March winds to keep a pretty hairdo in place!



Barbara likes her coat so well she makes a skirt to go with it! This in a silk-and-rayon linen, Vogue "Easy to Make" Design No. 9119, costs her all of $4.35. She can wear this with her black sweater, white cardigan or trimmed shirt.*

One good thing leads to another . . . and Barbara makes a blouse, Vogue "Very Easy to Make" No. 9116—$2.93. The skirt and blouse make a basic dress, a perfect costume worn under the coat.*

MAC GOWAN

The "dress" with her narrow black belt, turquoise scarf and gold jewelry. Equally pretty with her coral cummerbund for accent. Besides her costume look of all beige, she can wear the separates together with her white cardigan and, for a dressier look, with her coral bolero she made last fall.

"Yes, I like them very much."

"Don't be depressed tonight and don't think about the business until after New Year's."

"I always think about it," he said.

When Rosalie Lowry had told the Rutledges that she was actually shaking because of the Peales' arrival it had been quite true and arose from even more than anxiety over the first meeting with her husband's closest friend. In spite of all her social experience as Lowry's wife, the prospect of America was frightening to her. In Europe, Lowry had been hers in a special way—Europe was not his country as it was hers. There were aspects of life there which she understood at times better than he did. In general, the people they met were as new to him as they were to her, and he did not know people like Jim Peale, who had been important to him before she had. The large figure of her brother, Armas Lainvee, was always in the background. She knew what Foreign Aid was meant to accomplish and understood and was proud of what her husband's part in it was.

She was in complete agreement with him that he must return to and make his way in his own country, and that their children should be American in outlook and education. But she felt a great unease about American life. Now Lowry would need her less. There would be little in their new life, so she felt, on which her opinion would be useful.

Yet, as the year went to its wine-bright end in laughter and reminiscence and midnight kisses, she had more and more the feeling that the Peale she was with was not the friend, closer than a brother, whom Lowry had described to her. She could not put her finger on it. She supposed it was natural for Peale, during dinner, to talk quite a bit about C. I. C., but she thought Peale's reference to some great party in Sutton Place they had "gotten out of" to be with the Lowrys seemed rather unnecessary. Peale made a ponderous observation on the political situation and Lowry said:

"Jim, what a judicious remark from you. He's not getting judicious, is he, Evelyn? He was once, though, to great effect. I've never forgotten. It was when he told me you were engaged. I knew you were seeing a lot of each other, but I had no idea that it was at that stage, and I said, 'Isn't this rather sudden?' And Jim, in that wonderful superior way of his, said, 'As Proust has well said, "Everyone who is not in love imagines that one chooses the person one loves after endless deliberation."' Have I got it right, Jim?"

"Substantially," Peale replied.

"I proceeded on the same lines with Rosalie," Lowry said.

It seemed to Rosalie that Evelyn Peale might have replied, but she sat silent.

"Oh, I must tell you," Lowry went on. "This afternoon Rutledge had just asked me what I thought of a statement by one of the Fosdicks to the effect that educated men should resist the idea of business as the be-all and end-all of life, and I was about to launch into a hearty affirmative when we were interrupted, and he forgot to come back to it."

"Just as well you didn't," Peale said. "I don't think he would have liked it."

But all this judicious propriety was certainly not the whole of Peale. He seemed to talk to her more easily than to Lowry and did so absorbedly and even gaily. He made some reference to being tired after the strain of a hard autumn's work and she thought sympathetically that, after all, Lowry and she had been on holiday for three weeks.

He said something else, about wishing he could get away from immensities, so sadly that for a moment her heart went out to him and she found herself touching his hand and saying comforting little things to him as she did to her children. He told her she was very stirring and she tried to draw her hand away, not having meant to be that at all. He kept her hand in his but spoke of having met and liked her brother, Armas, in Paris three years before while she was away. Told her how devoted he himself had always been to Lowry's mother—both his parents had died before he entered Yale—and to his sister, and what a charming scamp Dahlgren, Stephen's older brother, was. And he talked a good deal about his eighty-five-foot auxiliary schooner and what fun they would all have on it next summer.

Sometime after eleven, Evelyn, across the room, called, "Rosalie, if I do two card tricks will you do your Spanish dance I'm hearing about?"

"I can't," Rosalie said. "The costume has disappeared."

"Do it in that," Peale said, trying to find music on the radio. "There, won't that do? Sounds like Bolero."

She hesitated a moment, rose, felt the rhythm sweep around her and began to dance. She had the feeling it was the unwisest thing she could do, but a happy year was almost at its end and who knew the future, and it was fun to please, and she danced well, her robe swirling in great spirals around her. Then, glancing at Peale's rapt face, she sank to the floor in obeisance and held out her hand to Lowry to lift her to her feet.

"Oh," she said, "I never thought, we haven't any cards."

"And the trick's only for children," Evelyn said. "And it's almost twelve and we must dance the New Year in." She switched the dial to a dance band and turned to Stephen. Peale pushed a table aside.

"Fill the glasses for midnight," Rosalie said to him.

"Come, there's no time," he said. They danced a moment, Peale holding her too close, the seconds ticking away. Then the dance tune dwindled away into Auld Lang Syne.

Stephen stopped beside them. "I forget how it goes, that wonderful passage: 'They stood in the noon of that strange and solemn splendor as if it were the light that shall unite all who belong to one another.'" He handed Evelyn to her husband and took Rosalie in his arms.

"Forever?" he whispered as he kissed her.

"Everything," she answered.

Then they joined the singing coming over the air and drained their glasses to each other.

An hour later when the Peales left, Lowry asked her eagerly how she liked them.

"Darling," she said, "I can't think of anyone I don't like. Come to bed, tell me how much you love me and tell me everything you first thought about me."

Lowry, loosening his tie, looked at her. "I want to kiss you," he said.

"I am not opposed to anything."

"Well," he said, "then I have to shave, lest I mar that magnolia skin."

"That's very thoughtful of you," she replied, kicking her slippers across the room. "I'll watch you shave. Do you remember the first time I did?"

Late in 1942, Capt. Stephen Lowry, an American officer on duty in London, was somewhat mutinous at having missed the landings in North Africa. In the course of his duties he learned of Operation Sardine, a two-man mission to the Norwegian Resistance, and volunteered for it.

In mid-December he was called before his C.O. regarding his application.

Colonel Channing, in peacetime the senior partner of a Stock Exchange firm, looked at the well-built, well-uniformed Lowry affably, which was to say that he appeared to have some pity for a man so badly put together in such an atrocious uniform.

"What do you regard as your special qualifications for Sardine? I presume you speak Norwegian?"

"No, sir. My main qualification is my high rating in the cold-climate tests."

"Well, if that were the most important we could send an Eskimo. I presume you are really animated by the spirit of adventure, the desire to travel at Government expense, meet new people. And I suppose it's pure coincidence that you apply just as Colonel Nedberg asks for you?"

"Not entirely, sir. I suggested to him that the Norwegians might like to see they have other allies than the British."

"It is not a desire for a posthumous Medal of Honor?"

"Oh, no, sir."

"You're just all healthy mind in healthy body?"

"Well, yes, sir, though I shouldn't have put it that way."

"Good, that's the type I like to see made expendable. By the way, you have no allergy to fish, have you?"

"No, sir."

"Very fortunate, as there are likely to be a great many fish about." He glanced at his wrist watch. "You will report to Colonel Nedberg in ten minutes and after a twenty minutes' talk you will both come back here and give me a detailed outline of how you will carry out this mission. Assuming that it does not overtax you mentally or physically, this is what you will do: Land on the Norwegian coast at the Resistance Rendezvous Twenty-seven where the local clergy, Pastor Larsen, will receive you. Nedberg will proceed to the neighborhood of Ordmark and prepare or be supplied with a report of the extent of sabotage at the heavy-water plant. This will be in terms comprehensible to the scientists. You will bring it out three days later. You will select and bring out with you that Resistance officer who impresses you as being most likely to be of value to the monitoring and broadcasting people. The officer must speak, in addition to a Scandinavian language, Russian and German. If your choice is a poor one, you will return to your native land on a slow boat for assignment to Motor Transport."

There were four men in the room of the Norwegian fisherman's log hut: Lowry; Col. Norodd Nedberg, from the Norwegian forces in London; a Lutheran pastor named Larsen the head of the local Underground; and another Resistance officer. The room was warm but Lowry and Nedberg, stripped of their soaking clothes, were being briskly toweled by the other two and, whether from immersion or nerves, were still shaking. The room smelled of fish and wet clothes. On the table two oiled-silk packages were open. In one were a dozen cigarette cases and in the other twenty vials of amphetamine tablets.

Outside the hut the moonless night was silent except as the snow itself creaked with the cold.

The door to the hut's other room opened slowly and an unseen hand dropped their dried clothes inside and closed the door. Lowry and Nedberg got into them. The warmth was slowly restoring their souls, and Nedberg, a signal officer, picking up one of the cigarette cases, opened it and began to explain in rapid Norwegian the workings of the wireless receiving sets inside them. The Resistance officer, haggard and drawn, glanced at his wrist watch and helped himself to an amphetamine tablet. Then he apparently began to repeat back to Nedberg the instruction he had received. Several times Nedberg stopped and corrected him.

Then over their shoulders Lowry saw the door slowly open again and around the corner of it peered what he was sure was the loveliest face he would ever see, and, staring straight at him, its owner smiled. It was a face of beauty and of ancient courtly race, he thought—like that of one of the young grand duchesses of the last czar. The cheekbones were high and far enough apart to give ample space for the wide dark blue eyes. The nose was tiptilted in the slightest degree and the lips were full but decorous. The girl's short hair was a pale bronze color.

She asked the pastor something. An assent rumbled out of his vast beard and she withdrew.

When the rubber boat which had brought Nedberg and him in from the British submarine tipped them into the icy fiord, Lowry had considered that a misbegotten sense of duty and patriotism had led him to volunteer for the mission. Now he could plainly see the hand of God had been in the affair. This was a face worth going through great perils and deep waters to see.

Its owner reappeared with some mugs of tea and four glasses of schnapps. The pastor said in English she was Officer Lainvee, of their group, and she shook hands with both newcomers. She wore stained pants, rough sweater, and fisherman boots to the knee. As the men drank, whatever was feminine about her seemed to dissolve and her attitude was as grave, soldierly and alert as theirs.

Nedberg, putting down his glass, began in rapid Norwegian what Lowry understood was a fill-in on the North African landings and the successes there. Dropping an occasional explanatory line in English to Lowry, he continued as to the objectives of their mission. After Lowry's departure, Nedberg would remain with them. London wanted an officer brought back with Lowry, familiar with the terrain and the extent of Resistance operations, but who was also a fluent Russo-German-Balto linguist.

The last provoked a long argument which Lowry could not follow. They all laughed at something that was said and Nedberg told him only the herring gutter had the qualifications.

"Who's the herring gutter?" Lowry asked.

"Lainvee."

"She guts herring?"

"Yes, that is the reason for her ancient fishlike smell."

"What's her first name?" Nedberg asked.

"Rosalie," he said. "She's an Estonian, escaped in June, '40, in a boat to Sweden and came over the mountains alone."

The talk went on as to Nedberg's move to Ordmark.

The herring gutter helped herself to the amphetamine, and went out with the pastor.

Nedberg left in the early-morning darkness, and when he was gone the pastor began his nontechnical account to Lowry of what had happened at Ordmark. Lowry ventured to ask what would be done about the linguist wanted by London. The pastor said Lainvee would see what was possible after she had had some sleep, and proceeded with a briefing on details of Resistance plans.

It was not until late afternoon that Lowry saw the herring gutter when she appeared with a loaf of bread and proceeded to make tea for them. Communication was difficult not only across the language barrier—though he had the feeling she spoke and understood more English than she pretended to—but because it was difficult to talk about what he wanted to.

The peril they were in and in which she continuously lived, the cold silence without and within the room—so that the slightest sound was like a tocsin—anxiety for Nedberg perhaps appearing closely pursued, the dread responsibility for meeting the scheduled submarine, fear that he himself might not play his part as he wished, all this in the presence of such stirring appeal as he had never faced, disguised though it was by her fisherman attire—all made it difficult to speak.

She asked him how much German he spoke. He said he knew a good many words and constructions but understood only if someone spoke slowly enough for him to think out the meaning.

"It is so that I am the same in English," she replied.

"Where have you studied?" he asked her.

"At university in Tallin, and I was some in Vienna a little."

"Do you mind my asking what your father did?"

"What does that mean?"

"What was your father?"

"He was lawyer. His life was very hard. He must work for years by himself to get education because the Russians would not let us go to the university then."

"What did his father do?"

"Do? He was peasant like all Estonians."

From pantomime and what he always insisted to her later was his extrasensory perception of language, he acquired, during the next hour, a considerable knowledge of Estonia and of Rosalie. Somehow from her voice, face and gesture he began to get a picture of life in Estonia on the farm of her grandfather, in her father's apartment in Tallin and her family's small summer house on the Baltic dunes where at midsummer you could read the epic Kalevipoeg until midnight or sing around the fires on St. John's Eve as the flames were fed so the flax would grow long. Once she sang a bar of one of the songs in a deep contralto, and years after found the English words for him:

"Wild wailing winds of misfortune and sorrow, Wizards from Finland, ride by on the blast."

They were interrupted by the pastor coming to summon her to record reports from Resistance officers who had come. Left alone with the pastor, Lowry questioned him about her. The pastor said her history was not an unusual one. On the terrible fourteenth of June, the Red forces had entered Tallin and by night found and arrested the Estonian leaders. The men, her father among them, were packed in cattle cars for Siberia in the morning. Her brother had got away. She had no idea where. Her mother and older sister had been jailed. Their fate was unknown. As for Rosalie—with her beauty there had, he supposed, been the inevitable fate. He had not asked her about it. Like most Estonians, her hatred of Russians and Nazis was equal. A woman of the Norwegian Resistance had told him Lainvee had suffered greatly, but where all suffered who was to say which was the greatest?

After supper Lowry insisted on taking the night picket on the Ordmark road by himself. The exhausted three agreed reluctantly and after Hansen had briefed him on signals and directions, the pastor took him aside. Rosalie was already asleep in her clothes. "I have watched you," the pastor said. "I remind you that the safety of us all and many of our comrades may depend on your alertness. The moon will be up. Think not of the moon but of our enemies."

All the frozen, lonely night Lowry kept his wits and senses at the trigger for the enemy, but underneath them he was powerless to keep his mind away from Officer Lainvee. Duty and desire fought inside of him. Certainly she met the requirements for the Resistance officer to return with him, or at least Channing had not made maleness one of them. But to bring her out only to lose her in the great complex of London was intolerable.

His relief came out at seven o'clock and back in the hut he found Officer Lainvee getting breakfast. "You have not found an officer to go to London?" he asked.

She shook her head.

"My orders are to bring out the best choice I can make. The Government in Exile has given the same to Colonel Nedberg. Therefore, I assume you will go with me."

"I will not go. It is too easy," she replied, pouring some coffee.

"It is not a matter for your decision. But there is another side to it. May I talk to you about it?"

"So then talk," she said, handing him a plate of smoking herring and a piece of bread.

He was ravenously hungry and began simultaneously on the herring and a labored exposition of his feelings, during which to his own astonishment he found himself saying he wished them to go "as man and wife."

"Such are the orders?" she demanded.

"No," he said, trying to set forth the depth and tenderness of his feeling for her.

"It is so that you wish me simply to go to bed with you?" she asked angrily. "One of them has told you I wish to go to America. You think I will do that to go?"

"No, no, I don't mean that. I desire to protect you in London because ——"

She burst into a torrent at the close of which she spat on the floor. "That is what peasants do," she told him. It was done, he thought, with the grace of a grand duchess. She grabbed her coat and left the hut and he did not see her alone again that day. Pastor Larsen told him she was seeking an officer to go to London.

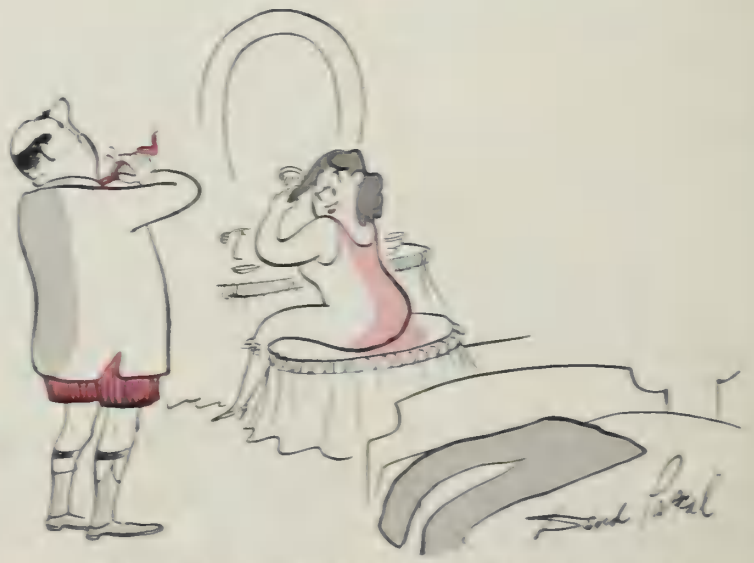
The next afternoon about dusk Nedberg arrived from the neighborhood of Ordmark. Lowry, waiting on the snowy road, saw the skier come over the brow of the hill and swoop down. He ran to him and found a man close to total exhaustion. Nedberg gasped out that he had the detailed report on the sabotage of the heavy-water installation, and that all was well. Lowry gave him a drink from his vacuum bottle of coffee and schnapps and with Nedberg leaning heavily on him, stopping at intervals with exhaustion and drowsiness, made a slow way back to the hut. They stripped him and the pastor massaged him with warm fish oil, rolled him in blankets and left him to sleep.

He was awake at ten the next morning, seeming fully restored. Lowry felt he could speak of what with him now ranked with if slightly after winning of the war.

"Noroddl," he said, "I should like to talk to you about a personal matter."

"So then, talk about it," Nedberg replied.

"It is my desire to marry Rosalie Lainvee."



"So then ask her."

"I have tried to do so and there is considerable language barrier. Will you see what you can do? I would like the pastor to marry us at once."

"She is disinclined to you?"

"I don't know. I'm afraid so, I expect nothing."

"That may be the trouble."

"I desire only to love and serve her."

"That, my comrade, has little appeal to women. Has she said no?"

"I think so. I can't leave her here."

"I have it in mind to speak to her then, but I don't know whether I will have success. Where is she?"

Lowry glanced at his watch. "She's monitoring until eleven."

Nedberg got up. "I go," he said.

Half an hour later he returned with Rosalie, looking annoyed but grand-ducal in her herring-gutter clothes. The nod she gave Lowry was a jerk of the head.

"Many problems," Nedberg said. "First it must be said that Officer Lainvee has found no suitable officer to go to London. It therefore appears that if you carry out your orders to bring out the most suitable officer available, she must go with you. That should end the matter."

"It does not wholly end it since I desire to marry her. If she will do that she will be able to go to America, whatever happens to me. I will change my will and my insurance and everything else."

"Do you understand?" Nedberg asked Rosalie.

"I did not understand and I did not listen," she told him.

"You mean marriage?" Nedberg asked Lowry. "That is, marriage legal and binding, not going to bed. There has maybe been misunderstanding."

"I mean it—for better, for worse, till death do us part."

"Hum, expressive. Is it original?" Nedberg asked, looking at the ceiling, and then translating for Rosalie.

At that a torrent of words poured out of her in a long declaration.

"What she is saying is she doesn't love you. That is in effect. At the same time it doesn't seem wholly hopeless since she hates Russia and Germany, the invaders of Estonia, and would like to live in America after the war. I myself did not understand all, as she spoke a great deal in Estonian. Wait, she is beginning again. . . . Hum, yes—you see, you seem to think she is aristocrat. She is not aristocrat but of peasant stock like all Estonians. Now she wants to know how old you are, how many brothers and sisters you have and are your parents living. Maybe this is progress. No, she says never mind, but she is born May, 1918."

"December, 1913. Please ask if I am repulsive to her."

"Oh, we needn't ask that. Quite foolish. She is now saying you're just dreamer."

"Dreamer or not, what is her answer?"

"You desire me to put the direct question?"

"Yes."

Nedberg did so and as Rosalie began her reply, he said to Lowry, "We had better sit down, this will be a long speech."

"I prefer to stand," Lowry replied and did so at excessive attention.

Her voice rose and fell in cadence and volume, but there was no break in the flood of words. It stopped at last in a gesture of seeming defiance, after which her hands clasped her breasts.

"Well, now," Nedberg said, glancing at his notes, "whether you are well advised to marry a woman of so many words, I do not know. Still, time and circumstances may alter that. Under many restrictions, mainly having little to do, so it seems to me, with reality, she will marry you. Oh, yes, are you Lutheran?"

"Something like that."

Nedberg informed her and she nodded.

"There is no implication of permanence. It is for her a means of escape. However, she will not disgrace you. She will have to be married in these herring-gutter clothes, not very nice for either of you. Also you must understand she had, well, an unpleasant time when the Red army entered Tallin."

"I understand."

"She also has doubts about the official situation. If in the getaway she is wounded or lost you are to carry out your duty, as to the Ordmark report, as though she were a male comrade. That is indispensable to her and I may say, as your senior officer, to me."

"I accept it."

"She is just saying that you have no obligation to go ahead with this just because you began it. She is content to leave matters as they were."

To a degree Pastor Larsen proved more difficult than Rosalie. He became completely the Lutheran clergyman, concerned with illegalities and the absence of orthodox procedure.

"I do not know whether my vows and the laws of church permit this. Waiving the question of banns, serious enough in itself, there will have been no registry. I do not think I can pronounce you man and wife."

"The situation is also difficult for me," Lowry replied. "Under the regulations of our Army I cannot marry without my commanding officer's permission. I will ask it at once on arriving in London. I believe my record and this mission will make him grant it at once on compassionate grounds."

"Then why not wait for that?"

"Because I do not wish to take her away under the promise of marriage."

"She is going as a polylingual Resistance officer."

"If she goes only as that, not only may I lose her but I cannot give her the protection I would wish."

"But if your commanding officer refuses?"

"Then I desire to be able to say we are married and pay the penalty."

"What would it be?"

"Loss of my commission and drafting into the Army."

"I must think about this," the pastor said, "and talk to Colonel Nedberg."

Later in the day the pastor talked again with Lowry. "In our folkways a betrothal, before witnesses, has the solemnity of marriage, carrying with it binding rights and privileges. Perhaps I could betroth you before God. More than that I cannot, since you tell me you are not of your own will allowed to take final vows."

"Will she not think it a subterfuge of mine?" Lowry asked.

"No, she will understand quite well, as would any Nordic maiden."

After the ceremony and a meager feast it was evident that whether as bridegroom or betrothed, Pastor Larsen, Nedberg and Rosalie expected that Lowry would not spend the night alone. His heart had been touched to the quick when Rosalie, shed of her fisherman clothes, had come in in a white dress with Pastor Larsen. She had made her faint responses in Norwegian and he, as the questions and vows were translated for him, in English. Somewhere Nedberg had found an old-fashioned gold ring, too large for her finger, which she had had to clutch to hold the ring.

In his exultation he had no doubts about the wisdom or rightness of what he had done. What concerned him was that she should understand he really meant what he said and recognized that she was to be won, if at all, only by waiting. But he tried to lighten the shadowy room and her sorrowful face with his own high spirits.

Whatever their private emotions, sleep itself was nothing to be trifled with at a Resistance point. Their own and many other lives depended on that great nourishment.

He took two blankets from the five in the bunk, spread them on the floor, and indicated he would sleep on them and she in the bunk.

"No, no," she said firmly in an Anglo-German dialect. "It is so you are betrothed bridegroom and now you have rights." She indicated by speech and gesture she knew what was expected of a bride and would not be something else. They wrestled linguistically over what the something was and she finally tried "objet de pitié, charité, l'on qui ne fait pas son devoir. I know men are pre-date-ory animals at wedding," she concluded in English.

"Predatory? I'm not predatory."

"You will be cold," she said, pointing to the floor.

"It doesn't matter."

He removed his boots and socks and rolled up in the blanket. It was certainly very cold. He heard her moving around for a minute or so and then she blew out the candle.

"Good night," he said. "Sleep well."

After a long pause she said good night.

He was not sure how much time had passed when she spoke to him again. He had been unable to sleep, less because of desire than the problems and anxieties thronging through his mind.

"It is schrecklich cold," she said. "I need those blankets. Get in this bed before we die."

He obeyed at once, bringing the blankets with him. She was lying with her face to the wall in her fisherman clothes, but her icy feet touched his as he lay down.

"I am sorry it all smells of herring but I was so cold. I thank you very much."

In the morning, though she sat on the edge of the bunk gravely watching him shave, she made no reference to them or their situation and was as much a Resistance officer alone with him as when they were joined by Nedberg and the pastor.

Lowry wished he had something he could give these devoted men he was leaving behind and did bring the pastor to accept his wrist watch.

"Have you any of your own money with you?" Rosalie asked in the afternoon when they were alone.

"Plenty. What would you like?"

"I would like to give the old woman who went a long distance in the snow, to borrow her daughter's wedding dress, a present."

"Of course. What about a hundred dollars? I have plenty."

"No, no—far too much. Would you please give me twenty-five? What kind of money is it?"

"Swedish kroner."

"Oh, good, thank you. I will be back in plenty of time."

He felt really married as he gave her the first of what he hoped would be a great deal of money.

They supped late, the pastor with them, so that the wait before going down to the shore would be as brief as possible. Half an hour before the moment fixed, the pastor, looking at Lowry's watch on his wrist, asked them to kneel while he invoked the protection of God for them all. Kneeling in the dim candlelight, head bowed, Lowry felt Rosalie's cold fingers reach for his and then her hand firmly clasping his. It was the closest physical contact there had been between them and he felt, as Amen was said, a consecration he was sure would be with him forever.

From the submarine's base in the Orkneys they were flown late the next night to London and Colonel Channing received them at his flat at three in the morning.

"Sir," Lowry said, "this is Officer Lainvee of the Norwegian Resistance. . . . And this is Colonel Nedberg's report on the heavy-water plant."

Rosalie clicked the heels of her fisherman's boots and stared straight ahead while Channing glanced at the report. As Rosalie was in the midst of an uncovered yawn, Channing, without looking up, asked, "Is the officer fatigued, Lowry?" As he asked it, Rosalie toppled over on the floor in a faint.

Lowry knelt, picked her up and put her in a chair with head between her knees.

"The officer, sir, is a very brave woman who has not eaten or slept in some time," Lowry replied.

"Lowry, I am very sorry. I really didn't notice. I'll get some brandy," Channing said. He came back with it and to Lowry's astonishment was as considerate and helpful as a woman.

Rosalie opened her eyes a little dazed, tried to apologize and get to her feet.

"She must get right to bed," Channing said. "What a beauty! She can stay here. I'll send for a nurse."

"There is a friend I can stay with, colonel," she said. "You must not think me weakling."

"Would you like some tea? What would you like?"

"To give you my papers and to tell you I shall do my best in any duty you give me," she said, added, "sir."

"Call the motor pool and have a car sent at once, Lowry. I think I'd better get you some breakfast."

"I could not eat, thank you. I will be all right in a very few hours. Will you please read my leader's notes on me?" Rosalie asked.

Channing looked carefully at the paper in Pastor Larsen's writing. "You seem to have chosen well," he said.

"Thank you very much, sir. We were very fortunate."

"Shall we say two o'clock at my office? No, I'm afraid it must be no later than noon. Can you both report then?"

"Yes, sir."

"Good. Help yourself to anything there is until the car comes." He picked up the telephone and asked for the duty officer at the Scientific Office.

The car took them through the now early morning to his two-room-and-bath flat off Russell Square, Rosalie dozing during the drive.

"When will shops be open?" she asked. "I need a great many things."

"Some by nine-thirty. We can sleep till then. Or you can go on sleeping. Make a list of what you want."

They walked up the stairs to the small ugly rooms.

"Were you ashamed I fainted? I was. Oh, bed and sheets," she said as he put on the lights. "Close the door until I call you." When he did, her clothes were on the floor and she in bed. "Please take them to the cats. I am sure there are many fishes' heads in them. Is there soap I can wash my hair with and any scissors for manicure? And any sweet powder even if I am a peasant? Have you a robe? Wake me when you go out. Bring me slacks and tricot. Lipstick it may be you can. Thank you," she said, and slept.

He set the alarm for 9:30 and lay down in the other room. Wrapped in his robe, he wakened him just before the alarm went off.

"I'm all rested and have bathed and washed my hair. And put out the things for breakfast. Where is cloth for ——" she asked, running a finger along a grimy tabletop.

"Dust?"

"I think so."

"I don't know of any," he said softly. "Take an old shirt. I'll have a quick shave and shower and get in a uniform."

In the sub, at the Orkneys, in the plane and until she fainted at Colonel Channing's, her speech and manner had been undistinguishable from that of any officer returning from a mission. Toward him she had been reserved and largely unsmiling. He sensed her troubled feelings in wanting to do what was expected of her, and was so touched by it he almost told her, "Look, we needn't stay married if you can't stand it. Your happiness is all I want." But what real "happiness" was she likely to find in a war-torn capital in the midst of a war far from won? With him she had some measure of protection.

"Well, I'll hurry," he said and closed the bedroom door after him.

When he came out, dark hair wet and brushed after the shower, dressed in a custom-made uniform, she looked at him in amazement and made a very guttural remark.

"What did you say?" he asked.

"I said Sa Puha Jumal, an exclamation in Estonia. It's compliment."

"I see," he replied, looking in the mirror.

He returned in an hour with a small gold wedding ring engraved "S. L. to R. L." He showed it to her.

"How is possible?" she asked.

"I stood with pistol to the engraver's head. It took twenty minutes. May I put it on?"

She nodded and held out her finger. His hope for a kiss came to nought. He had a small bunch of flowers in an old newspaper, and slacks and jersey from the PX. And a trench coat lined with wool. She shook her head over them all rather ominously, he thought, and then looked up at him.

"There is nothing different?" she asked.

"What do you mean?"

She gave two deep sniffs and stood with her nose in the air. "I bathed again after you went out. You can't tell after all the soap, it is still fish?"

"Oh, no, it's lovely."

"Thank you. I have thought so. Any lipstick?"

He handed it to her.

"I come," she said, going into the bedroom with the slacks and jersey.

"The right size?" he called in a moment.

"You will see soon."

The door opened and he turned to see her looking, as he thought, like a page from a fashion magazine.

"Never will I touch any fishes again," she said.

"You're wonderfully beautiful."

"Thank you. You may kiss me, if you like. You are very good to me."

He took her in his arms eagerly, but she only brushed his lips with hers, and then leaning back her head said, "Don't be angry or laugh, but it is a little embarrassing for me and breakfast is ready."

To have the descendant of Estonian peasants, the herring gutter, the Resistance officer and the fashion model before him, all in one, was marvelously exciting and romantic, but as she set the table and served the orange juice and the creamed chicken and poured his coffee it came over him, in a great wave of revelation, that though he had gone a long way to do it he had really married the well-brought-up little girl next door whom he had known all his life. The Lord had indeed made of one blood all the nations of the earth.

At noon they reported to Colonel Channing. He saw Rosalie first alone while Lowry waited nervously in the anteroom. It was after one when she appeared, looking somewhat drawn and anxious.

"It is all right, I think," she said quickly to Lowry. "This is where I go." She showed him a pass to the Ministry of Information. "For monitoring. I will meet you at five today, other days very late."

"At home?"

She nodded and went down the stairs. Channing motioned Lowry to come in. The ensuing interrogation was long and searching, but made no reference to Rosalie. When it was completed Channing told him he was to go to Norwegian headquarters and repeat the report. He gave no indication of the degree of his own satisfaction with what Lowry had said.

Lowry, rising to leave, asked if he might speak to the colonel as man to man. Channing nodded coldly. Lowry asked whether the colonel felt the mission had been satisfactorily accomplished. Channing said the answer would depend in part on the value placed on his information by the Norwegian headquarters.

Subject, then, Lowry said, to how the Norwegians viewed his report, he desired the colonel's permission to marry Officer Lainvee immediately.

"Then," asked Channing, "you do not regard the ceremony performed by Pastor Larsen as sufficient? Or are you trying to evade the penalty of what you have done?"

Lowry, startled, realized that Channing could have learned of it only from Rosalie, and why she had suddenly decided to tell Channing distressed him—or had Channing in questioning her caught the scent of it and then caught her? He told Channing that he regarded himself as bound by the betrothal ceremony and that, though he had no desire to evade the consequences of his behavior, he hoped that circumstances and compassion would justify permission to marry.

"Before you went on Sardine, you applied for combat duty in Northwest Africa. The application has been approved and your E.T.D. is five days off," Channing replied.

The assignment he had so earnestly sought lost, for the moment, some of its attraction. He expressed his thanks but said it made the permission more vital to him.

"You will be informed of the decision in due course," Channing said.

Three Norwegian officers questioned Lowry for over an hour and he had the feeling as he left that their report to Channing would be ■ commendation, even a high one. But he made his way to his rooms a prey to the most gloomy emotions.

He found Rosalie already there poring over an English grammar. She looked up at him with obvious concern.

"Are you angry with me? Please don't be."

"Of course not. What happened with Channing?"

"I am very sorry, but he is like a devil in some ways. He was examining me in most minute fashion. Everything, everything you said or did in Norway. He had a sheet of paper with hours marked on it and he made notes as I answered him. Then he said, 'Now let us go back to Colonel Nedberg's return from Ordmark—the night before you left. What time did the three of you separate?' and I answered, 'After the betrothal. Captain Lowry and I went to the other hut.'"

"Oh, Rosalie ——" Lowry blurted out.

"I know, I could die. What have I done to you?"

"I don't know. It doesn't matter if you will only marry me."

"I have married you already."

"What more did Channing say?"

"I tried to explain. And I said I would do anything asked of me for the Allied cause."

"I asked him for permission to marry you and he would give no answer except to say that I am to rejoin my regiment in North Africa in five days. I had asked to do that before I went to Norway."

"Five days?" she gasped, getting to her feet. Then she said, "Whatever will be, I am bound to you if you want me to be."

"By love?"

"No, I cannot say that, but by promise and duty. You may think you love me, but it is not I am sure."

"Do you want it to be?"

She made a gesture of what he regarded as unnecessarily cruel indifference. He said he would take her to dine at the Savoy as soon as he had washed. He closed the bedroom door behind him and noticed the twin beds had been freshly made. In the bathroom the shelf had been neatened to make room for a modest array of her new toilet articles. He was examining them all with consuming interest when she knocked gently on the door.

"Yes?" he said, opening it.

She held out an official envelope. He tore it open, glanced at the signature, "Alexander Channing, USA, commanding ——" and saw the words "Permission to marry is granted ——"

"Oh, it's all right."

"I guessed. Look," she said, holding out a personal card of Colonel Channing's on which he had written The brave deserve the fair. Floreat Estonia! "It came with a bottle of champagne."

"No caviar?"

"Please do not speak even of the eggs of fishes," she said.

"Are you happy?" he demanded. "For heaven's sake, say so."

"I am not happy that you go to Africa. But this minute I am."

"Happy—say it."

"It is so."

To blow into the Savoy beside a beautiful girl with bronze-gold hair, the observed of all observers, whom he scarcely knew but who was his somewhat unlawful wife was really, he thought, the splendor and crown of life.

In the soft luxury of the broad hotel bed in New York they talked about it, their recollections supplementing each other's, asking and answering questions as they had scores of times.

"Do you remember," she asked, "that when you came back after the first day in London, you found me studying an English grammar? I was so smart to do that. I knew I must quickly speak good, fluent English."

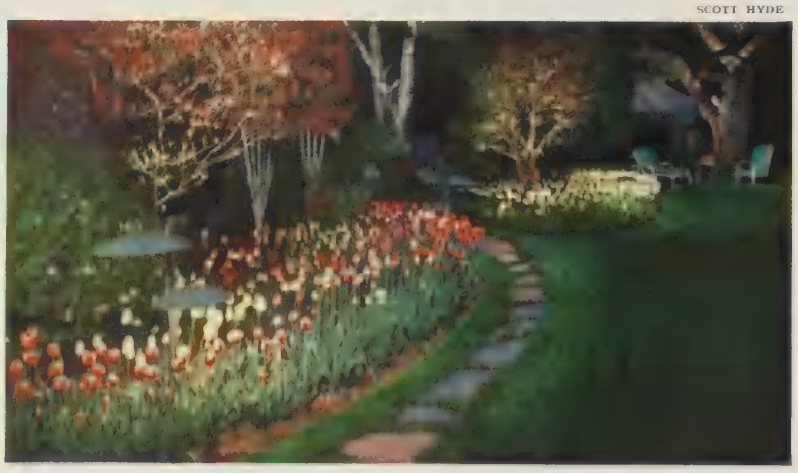
"I thought your dialect was enchanting," he said.

"You would have been exasperated by it in a short time. I was half in love with you, you had such nice manners and habits, and I hadn't planned to fall in love. You made me forget every unhappy thing and I felt deliciously wicked and more than acquiescent, oh, much more."

"You talked about being faithful, do you remember?"

"Of course. We both swore we would be, which was utter madness at the time. How could we know? You made a big to-do about my being free but that I must promise not to be unfaithful when I was angry or lonely or because I pitied somebody. What a time I had understanding all the words. But promising those three things left no way to be unfaithful."

"I didn't forbid it if you fell in love."



"Oh, 'fell in love'; you were already beginning to be dominant and I knew I wouldn't dare fall in love or you might throw me out a window."

"You confessed to being without physical modesty."

"That is an absolute lie. I never said such a thing, and it wasn't that night besides. I said all Nordic people, especially Balts, loved sun and air all over them," and, "Connais tu le pays wo die Citronen blumen," she sang. "You see, I am still polyglot and you were never to think because I took all my clothes off it

New beauty at night...with light

By MARGARET DAVIDSON.
Homemaking Editor of the Journal

At night, terrace and gardens can be lighted for both drama and safety. Guiding beams that outline paths and steps and driveways save falls, and well-lighted grounds are less often molested than dark hideaways. In our Portfolio House of this month, for example, all outdoor lights can be controlled from a switch in the master bedroom. Plus safety factors, you give new dimension to night entertaining with your outdoor lighting, when softly lit flower beds are in view beyond windows—and, of course, threads of light help lead the way for first-time visitors or late-arriving guests.

● Small shaded light illuminates steps. Some have spiked ends for movability. But for permanent installation (and best idea for new homes), wire underground, with connections for stationary lighting—and ask for extra waterproof outlets for lawn mower or radio.

● Portable lamp stand can be carried to work or play spots as needed—here, it helps as you make those late trips to the barbecue to bring in utensils before the morning dew. Many fixtures now available use weather-defying bulbs which actually need no shield—but with the neighbors in mind, lighting should be shaded or directed so as not to glare.

● To cast light along a whole walkway: this swivel fixture, staked in ground, can be concealed by foliage. Others have mountings for attaching to trees, under eaves, where they hardly show.

meant anything else at all. But I never said that at the Savoy, Mr. Long-Remember."

He remembered how she awoke laughing, that divine morning, and how ever after in the weal or woe of their life she had been riante with him. He remembered when he first discovered the full beauty of the word. After the triumphal entry into Tunis, his general had taken him and a number of younger officers who had distinguished themselves to be presented to the frock-coated bey. They had all been astonished by "the democratic manners and Western ways" of the potentate. Lowry saw an old, thick red book on the table. It was a Larousse dictionary, and he opened it to riante. It might, he thought, have been the definition of Rosalie: Qui annonce de la gaieté; agréable à la vue, agréable à l'esprit.

In September, 1943, while he was fighting in Southern Italy, a son was born to Rosalie in London. Lowry was of course tremendously pleased and proud, but when at the end of the year, after being wounded, he was ordered to go with the Overlord planners to London, he felt for the moment a most unworthy jealousy of his small son, whose mother he had so briefly known. His feelings horrified himself.

Two weeks after her son's birth, Rosalie had reported for duty at the ministry, to be told it was felt best that she not return. In reply to her normal surprised questions there had been assurances of high satisfaction with her work, but she was told she could not cable her husband about it.

"But he will think me a quitter, a weakling," she protested.

The official to whom she was talking said, "There can be small doubt that the Nazi forces in Estonia are trapped and will be taken or slain by the Red army. Our ally will occupy the whole Baltic. You are known to be anti-Russian ——"

"Anti-Russian! God in heaven, my father, my mother, my sister, I ——"

"I know, but there is a great desire in high quarters to keep the Russians happy. The Russians list your name among undesirables and, reviewing your case, it is felt no real hardship is involved in pleasing them. I have ventured to say that in pleasing them 'the last case of the man will be worse than the first,' but one man or woman matters little."

Her dark-lashed blue eyes filled with tears. "That is true if one individual is sacrificed to save many. This will save no one. There is nothing I can do?" she asked after a moment.

"Nothing," he said, "except to regard it as nothing."

She knew, of course, only approximately when Stephen would arrive. It was in a moonlight week and the thought of his flight across Biscay filled her with terror. It took a moment, whenever door or telephone bell rang, before she could speak. Absurd alarms filled her mind—that he had the wrong address or that the house would be bombed just before he came and he never be able to find them. Or that on meeting, one or the other would feel a sudden overwhelming revulsion toward the other. Memories of the white summer midnights of her girlhood in Estonia, filled with the scent of pines and flowers, thronged in her mind; the sea bathing, the beach fires at Midsummer's Eve.

An almost unknown man would arrive in the small unattractive flat. She had met him in the clothes of a herring gutter. Now she would have to receive him in the drab garments of wartime austerity—without, as she thought, memory or prospect of daintiness, or of ever having been together in a pretty room or in the sun. And what they had missed she did not then see would ever be recovered or compensated for. When he came, two strangers would find themselves shut off together in repellent intimacy.

Coming up from Gib in the long moonlit night Lowry was also the prey of warring emotions. He felt no doubt that he was going to what was his heart's desire. Precious as their small son was to her, she did not write of him as though he were their flesh and blood. It was Madonna and Child, not the Holy Family. But he said to himself all this was to be expected.

How was he to begin with her, how be natural, how make it clear he still expected to win her? Yet he was sensible enough to see that to revert to the austerity of their Norwegian night would be more ridiculous than chivalrous. Still, better be ridiculous than arrogant or possessive about what he did not really possess.

He rang the bell of her flat late the next afternoon. The plane had landed in the morning in Southwest England but the train had not left until noon, coming up through a dismal landscape.

He could not hear her coming and the sudden opening of the door startled him. They stared at each other a few seconds. She wore a blouse and slacks and her thick glorious hair was page-boy length.

"Oh, darling," she said. "It is all right. I was so frightened it wouldn't be." She kissed him. He pushed his bedding roll through the door with his foot, shed his bag and coat, closed the door with an elbow and resumed kissing her.

"There was no trouble from the moment we saw each other," she said afterward. "I can't imagine what I was so afraid of."

She led him to the crib in the bedroom and he looked down in awe at the sleeper. "I am very inexperienced about people like this," he said, staring at their son.

"I know, so was I, but he's very companionable. How do you think you will like him?"

"I like him already," he said, touching the tiny fingers.

"He grows on you. Dear, I feel terribly keyed up. Can we have a drink and talk a moment?"

"Can I get it?" he asked.

"No, I will. Sit down; it's a very ugly room, but it's all lit up now. Stephen, do you think we'll get along all right? Do you want to know I haven't had any 'pity' from anybody?"

"I ——"

"Don't say. It doesn't matter—or not now, anyhow."

He opened his kit bag and took out a small package. "It isn't much," he said. "I got it in Algiers from a French officer when I first went out. It had come two thousand miles across Africa and a Roman officer might have brought it from Carthage to his bride in Rome."

In the package was a necklace of ivory and gold, antique, barbaric and beautiful. She gave a little gasp of pleasure, put it around her neck.

"To have a husband come home isn't as frightening as I thought."

"Have you been very frightened about it?" Stephen asked.

"Sometimes, yes, particularly yesterday and this morning. Before that, when I was worried about whether you were safe I had a special train of thought I took comfort in. I'd make myself forget there was war and I'd say, 'Well, now he's washing his hands, or putting on his coat, now he's writing a letter ——'"

"Oh, I know. I did the same sort of thing, visualizing you brushing your hair, or dressing, or getting off a bus, unlocking the door, doing your breakfast dishes, eating with your pretty manners."

"I had no idea I would like you so much. You know what?—as you Americans say with your awful usage."

"No, what?"

"Ma armaston sind, I love you. But why do I love a stupid fellow I hardly know who doesn't know enough to say he likes my hair

HAPPY ENDING

By ETHEL BARNETT DE VITO

The heroes of another day
That fiction used to crown
As "debonair" and "devil-may-care"
Or "dashing," steeped in
"savoir-faire."
Have given way to sterner clay That's "lean and hard and brown."

And heroines, once of a hue
Allied to "cream" and "peaches"
With "violet eyes" and contours seen To match a "Tanagra figurine."
Are "tall," "tanned," but for the inch or two
That a Bikini reaches.

But though the girls and boys
we know
Are of a different feather.
And "Daisys," "Mabels," "Drews" and "Dirks"
Are "Lindas," "Marilyns," "Jims" and "Kirks,"
Their object now, as long ago,
Is still to get together!

give your hands extra protection with Trushay

There's one simple reason why you should use Trushay on your hands. Trushay is richer in beauty-protecting ingredients than all other leading lotions. That's why more and more women are using it. Trushay doesn't simply protect hands—it gives them extra protection when they need it most. And it's so wonderful to use. Just a few drops are all you need to feel Trushay's richness melt into your hands and give them a feeling of softness all over. Yet with all these advantages, extra-rich Trushay is priced just the same as ordinary lotions. There isn't a reason in the world to settle for anything less!

On Monday morning, a little after ten. owry appeared at Rutledge's office with his nancial statement and received a most rdial welcome. Rutledge had already talked Peale about his bills and, as he had first essed, found they were a complete oversight. ith his anxieties relieved, he had his usual nguine feeling that the new year would be a record breaker, and he was pleased to see that Lowry was properly dressed for an office.

"I don't think we need any palaver," Rutledge said. "I take it you're satisfied, and I am. I propose you settle down with us tomorrow and I have asked your principal associates to lunch with us at the club. That agreeable?"

"Very much so," Lowry replied. "I would like to say how much I appreciate your confidence and to assure you I shall give everything I have to justify it. Here is the statement of my affairs you asked for."

Rutledge unfolded it and read with the slow care of a man to whom reading was not a pleasure. Lowry was not fully prepared for the look of almost appalled amazement that came over Rutledge's face. The brief statement showed total assets of some $8000. There were no liabilities, but that a man past forty should have accumulated so little, or have had nothing of his own to start with, profoundly shocked him.

"This is the whole thing?" he asked.

"I am afraid it is."

Rutledge gave a little cluck of dismay. "I suppose we have to consider you've not been in a profit-making organization. I suppose there are a good many reasons for this—inadequate Government pay, growing family ——"

William and the train

By POLLY TOLAND

William and I have visited the Train quite often. We have found it asleep in the station. We have peered down at it when it has wonderfully gone underneath the bridge, at the very moment we stood on top; and, best of all, the engineer has tooted his whistle at us, making the Train talk. But this time, we have gone for a ride on the Train.

William holds my ticket, because he's too little to have one, and he gives it to the conductor. "Is he the postman's brother?" asks William in a loud whisper.

"I don't know." The idea has never occurred to me.

"No," says William. "He's too dark blue. The postman's much lighter blue. But they may be friends?"

We wonder where everyone is going. We wonder why the seats are green. We wonder why blue jeans are hanging from someone's wash line. William wants me to ask the lady in front if the bird on her hat is dead. I decline, but the lady (who has a nice smile) turns round to William and says it is. We go under the bridge. We hear the whistle toot. We get off at our own station. William has really met the Train.

"Good-by, dear Train," says William tenderly to its square, retreating back.

"Good-by, dear Train," I say. And I'm talking to the Train. I'd never really met it until William introduced us.

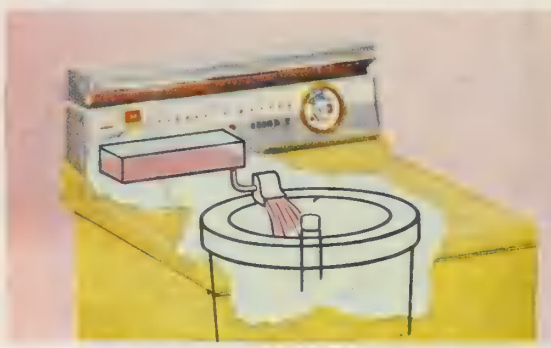
1957 HOTPOINT WONDERINSE WASHER



No matter how wonderfully an automatic washer may wash clothes, it's really no more efficient than its rinsing action. And in the 1957 Hotpoint, remarkable things happen during the rinse cycle. We call it WONDERINSE . . . you'll call it wonderful.

You simply press a button when you start the washer. Automatically, at exactly the right time, the new WONDERINSE chemical — Rinse-Rite — is injected into the final rinse water.

This wonder-working formula performs 3 important jobs: it conditions the rinse water, softens fabrics, and actually rinses newness into clothes. Whites are whiter, colors stay far brighter and sharper. Hotpoint-washed clothes look and feel cleaner. Bath towels are fluffier. Linens and cottons are softer, too, but never limp-soft. And, as the finishing touch, WONDERINSE seals the pores of fabrics. Clothes stay clean longer, wash clean easier the next time around.

See the Hotpoint WONDERINSE Washer. It can change your whole idea of what to expect from a modern automatic. Because here is a new helpmate that not only washes . . . but actually conditions your clothes too!

Find Your Hotpoint Dealers in The Yellow Pages

Reservoir holds a full quart of WONDERINSE chemical — Rinse-Rite. Just push a button, when you start the washer, and the correct amount is automatically injected into the final rinse.

Even the individual threads in fabrics are softer, fluffier after WONDERINSING. They stay clean longer. "Pores" are sealed to resist dust and soil. Iron easier, too, because of fewer wrinkles!

Normal or delicate fabrics, with Hotpoint two-cycle washing, are laundered in proper quantity of water at proper temperatures, for right length of time. Touch a button . . . set the Wond-R-Dial.

He stopped in the middle of his sentence. Another case of a man they had taken on several years ago flashed through his mind. Only after he had been with them a month had he revealed the complicated domestic situation which required the company to be on notice as to the payment of monthly alimony to a previous wife and his three children.

Rutledge cleared his throat. "Your wife and children are your only dependents?"

"Yes, though I've had to help my sister occasionally. Her husband's a chemistry professor in a small college and they've had a rather hard time."

"I see. But your present marriage—that is to say, you have no other family?"

Lowry laughed. "Oh, no. No other family, no other marriage, no breach-of-promise suits pending."

"Well, I didn't mean that, of course," Rutledge replied, his relief tempered by the levity. "Your mother's provided for? I apologize for this seeming to pry, but I take it to be my duty to know just what my juniors are up against."

"My mother has her own money from my father's estate. She has a farm in Ohio which shows a profit."

"From what?"

"Beef cattle, mainly."

"What did you get for your father's company when he died?"

"Only about a hundred and fifty thousand dollars. I was at the war at the time and my brother handled it. I don't imply I should have done better."

"You could hardly have done worse. A hundred and fifty for Lowry Equipment? He must have been out of his mind. Let me see, do I know your brother?"

"Dahlgren."

"Dahlgren—not Dolly Lowry?"

"I'm afraid so."

Rutledge gave a great sigh. "I just never connected the two. I was with two other men in Guy Eliot's office at the Founders when your brother came in and announced that Guy Eliot was a Fascist and wanted to do business with Hitler. Then he went to the Times and Tribune and tried to get them to publish a letter about him."

"I know," Lowry said, "he's a rather difficult fellow."

"He's been divorced twice, hasn't he?" Rutledge said.

"Yes. If this changes the picture, you're not bound in any way."

Rutledge was not sure whether this independence pleased or displeased him. "Where is your brother now?" he asked.

"He has a small job in Stonington, Connecticut."

"It's not a question of my being bound. The question is, are you the best man for the job? I'm prepared to believe you are, but I'd like some assurance I now have the full story," Rutledge replied.

"I haven't concealed anything. You asked for a financial statement. You have it. I didn't suppose the price of a factory sold in 1944 concerned you and I assumed you knew Dahlgren was my brother and I don't regard the fact that he is as a disgrace."

"Now, now," Rutledge protested, "I'm not criticizing you. I have a very heavy responsibility and if I seem irritable I apologize." He wished, however, he could ask directly about Mrs. Lowry's record. Suppose she were a communist. Still, the State Department must have been satisfied on that point

"You may be wondering about my wife. Her whole family was killed or exiled by the Soviets in 1940 except for one brother, her only known living relative."

"Who is he?"

"Armas Lainvee. He's the senior partner of the very rich French banking firm of Delacroix and Company."

"Oh, is that so? Fine. We know them well," Rutledge said, enormously relieved and affable.

"However, you'd better know that my mother was the actress Joan Denney, and that she started her career in the Follies," Lowry told him curtly, getting to his feet.

"My dear boy," Rutledge said, beaming, "that beautiful lady is your mother? Well, if I had to go through all this to find that out, it's worth it. Now let's wash out all this other nonsense and get to work. Go for your physical this afternoon—it's just routine—meet me here at nine-thirty in the morning and we'll all lunch privately at the club."

Going down the carpeted hall, Lowry asked a passing clerk where Mr. Peale's office was. He found Peale in and told him all was settled.

"Well, I knew it would be," Peale said, "unless you told Rutledge what you told me the other night. Do you remember?"

"Certainly I remember. I don't expect to talk to Rutledge as I might to you. I was only expressing to you and the girls my objection to devoting the next twenty years to business. I hope to make enough in ten to do something more valuable or more interesting in the next ten after them."

"You'll find it doesn't work that way," Peale replied. "What does Rosalie think about all this?"

"Well, you know she's just a beautiful peasant girl."

"Has she ever heard a word of her family?"

"Only her brother, whom you've met."

"Terrible thing," Peale said. "Is she still affected by it?"

"She seldom speaks of it, but I know that even now she still hopes to hear."

"Was her sister as beautiful as she is?"

"I really don't know. I should think from looking at her and Armas it ran in the family."

"You know I somehow can't picture Rosalie except as she was the other night, gay and laughing yet wonderfully understanding and sympathetic. Was that true about her and the fisherman's clothes?"

"Oh, yes."

"I hope you appreciate her," Peale said curtly. "I didn't make a bad impression on her, I hope. I did get a little tight."

"You both made more than an impression," Lowry said, and feeling it was time Evelyn's name was mentioned added, "She felt she had always known Evelyn." He felt he ought to say more about Evelyn and that perhaps she had not wholly approved of all the gaiety.

She had soberly said to the sleepy Peale on the way home, "I do hope that all this drinking and nonsense isn't to be characteristic of seeing the Lowrys. I must say I couldn't picture her in the Resistance. She seemed to have so little."

"She's beautiful," Peale said. "Don't you think so?"

"She evidently does and rather flaunts it, I thought."

"You mean the dance?"

"The dance and other things."

"But the dance was your doing," he said, and fell asleep in the corner of the car.

Luncheon the next day was in most ways what Lowry had grown accustomed to in Europe. There were a dozen well-dressed, well-informed men, friendly and easy to talk to. It was hard to realize they were all, except Rutledge and Johnson, in one way or another his rivals. Yet under their ease Lowry got a feeling of marked self-consciousness about three of them—Peale, Hewitt and Evans—as though each had long ago decided on the impression it was most advisable for him to make and conformed strictly to it.

Charles Curtis, the treasurer, was about the age of Rutledge, rather scholarly looking, cordial but reserved in manner. In appearance Calvin Hewitt was the most striking, with the fine figure of a college oarsman who with the years has put on a moderate amount of weight. He had been the handsomest man in his class in college and in most gatherings still was. His face was unlined and in repose had something spiritual about it, blotted out by the breezy manner of a good fellow, and a fund of bawdy stories told in a chuckling undertone to everyone but Rutledge and Johnson. His juniors roared as he told them.

Leslie Evans struck Lowry as rather colorless. He was particularly interested in meeting Thomas Johnson, the president, who Rutledge had said would succeed him at his retirement. He was thick-set, of medium height, about fifty-five. His very dark blue suit was the best in the room and there was an unmistakable air of great ability, alertness and affability about him. He listened more attentively than Rutledge and spoke less, but he gave the impression that he would always know what to do and that it would be the right thing for all concerned. And from every outward thing about him it was hard to believe he had started life as a steel puddler.

The talk turned to where Lowry was going to live and all the considerations that went into it. He explained that he had until summer, when the children arrived, to decide on a permanent place, and would look for a furnished apartment in town until then.

There was manifest cordiality about getting him and his wife for dinner—what's a good time for my wife to reach yours or can we fix a time now? It was all as nice as could be, and though he was not looking for "good talk," "the art of conversation," "the latest books and plays and music," it all sounded about as stirring as a commuter's train schedule.

Yet when the coffee had been poured and Rutledge made a little speech it was stirring. What major industry had set out to do, it had done better than anyone else from distribution to pure research. When any Point Four program could accomplish what Aramco, for example, had in Saudi Arabia for the welfare of the people there, he, Rutledge, would turn C. I. C. over to the socialists. Competition and incentive were the basic reasons for it. Aramco knew, just as C. I. C. knew, that if Blender catering for youngsters brightens up their lives and appetites! Sure-to-please specialties—in amounts for four:

RAINBOW GLASS is layered puréed fruit. Use 1 cup raspberries and 1 of peaches—the frozen kind partly thawed—each blended separately with 2 quartered marshmallows. Place one above the other in juice glasses or custard cups. Try other fruits, canned, fresh or frozen. A little lemon improves bland fruits. Vegetable coloring perks up pale ones.

SPACE-CADET COCKTAIL is chilled tomato juice (one 10-ounce can) whirled in the blender with ½ stalk celery, chopped, and a small sprig of parsley. Serve while frothy and foamy.

ALL-STAR SANDWICH when ■ gang gathers after school is a sturdy baked-bean spread. Strain 1-pound can beans, add ⅓ cup sliced cucumber pickle, 1 slice onion, and blend to consistency of crunchy peanut butter.

CONFETTI SOUP is 1 cup leftover cooked vegetables (peas, carrots, broccoli, or a combination of several) whizzed in the blender with 2 cups seasoned milk or stock, 1 tablespoon flour and 1 slice onion. Bring to a boil, then serve in a colorful bowl topped with dry puffed cereal.

CIRCUS LEMONADE takes its color from 1 package frozen strawberries, thawed, blended with ¼ cup each of lemon juice and sugar. Add 1 pint water, a tray of ice cubes.

APRICOT IGLOOS are mounds of sherbet made from 2 cups canned or cooked dried apricots blended with 1 cup of the juice, 6 quartered marshmallows and juice of ½ lemon. Whip until smooth and freeze. For extra lightness, blend when frozen to the mushy stage (half the amount at a time) and continue freezing.

YIPPEE WAFFLES earn their name when 1 cup diced ham or cheese, smoothed in the blender with 1 cup water, is stirred into a package of waffle mix. Then add remaining liquids called for on the package. Count on seconds of these.

they didn't do it, Texas or Shell or another competitor would. And for doing it they received the magnificent incentive of about five cents for every dollar of sales. What gave him the greatest satisfaction was the very meagerness of that incentive. A return like that left no room for doubts as to how the rewards were distributed. But profit wasn't the only thing they were in business for. He had had another great satisfaction in the last few days. In his talks with Stephen Lowry, who was joining them today, he had been able to say with complete truth that every man at the table—and the whole organization—would receive him, help him, and accept help and advice from him, as though he had long been one of them. Well, he could see from Charley Curtis' face that it was time to go back and count the money and he suggested they do so.

Lowry spent the afternoon reading a mass of reports and in several talks with members of the staff. He was fascinated by reports of activities of FOA and the Point Four program, with which he was familiar, and the detailed and usually well-grounded reports on their personnel, high and low, whom he knew. He had not realized how attentive American business was to the quality of Government personnel abroad.

One report had this to say of his own visit to Turkey:

"I went to a cocktail party at the embassy to meet Mr. Stephen Lowry, here on a special investigation for FOA. I had heard there was an internal row about his coming as a consequence of his somewhat ruthless correction of abuses by Americans and others, which you probably read about in Time magazine. However, he made an excellent impression on everyone, Turkish and American, and put America on the map culturally by asking to be taken over the route of the Ten Thousand to the sea. The Minister of Education took him in his own car. On the trip Lowry 'happened' to discuss some farm-school problems with the minister, who, having heard Lowry call out 'Thalassa, Thalassa' at the right moment on the road, yielded on some restrictions he had insisted upon, the project was confirmed and we will build the schools and dig the ditches. (Photostat of our contract attached.) Lowry told me it was all luck and the idea was on the spur of the moment. I talked to his wife, a foreigner, very attractive, and she said he knew how to go a long way around to get his own way. Too bad there aren't more like him."

There is little use to talk about your child to anyone; other people either have one or haven't.

(Doubleday & Company, Inc.)

A little after four Rosalie made her first telephone call to him at the office. He had sent her to a renting agent and she had been apartment hunting all day. She had found one they could sublet furnished, four rooms and bath, high up in Gramercy Square. Could he meet her there? She wanted to move that night before the hotel bankrupted them. This was only $225 a month. She went on to say that it was very attractively furnished. The people had gone to Florida for five months. "I'm sure they are nice people—they have a desk and books, comfortable old chairs. Very pretty china and lamps and things like that." Could he come now?

"Oh, I think so. In about twenty minutes."

He stopped to tell Jim Peale he was leaving and why, and to his surprise Peale looked ■ little dismayed. "Gramercy Park?" Peale said. "I don't think that's any place for you to live. Why the rush?"

"We want to get settled and economize. Nothing disreputable about Gramercy, is there?"

"Well, no, not disreputable, but I never knew anybody who lived there. Children play in it and the Players' Club's down there, but I think you're rushing it. Call them up and say you've changed your mind and I'll get hold of a fellow at Douglas Elliman's."

"Can't wait. Rosalie's there now."

To his surprise Peale went to the elevator with him, saying, "Really, Steve, this sort of thing is more important than you seem to realize. How big is it?"

"Four and bath."

"But listen, four rooms! You can't live in four rooms. How are you going to have people to dinner?"

"Just have four, one in each room. So-long."

The next night the men of C. I. C. were all eagerly awaited by their wives, for, whatever their positions, it was Wednesday. The back of the work week was broken, and the last of the leftovers from Sunday dinner gone. The money market was also easier, even if it was another week till payday.

Of course the eager waiting was not in every case a happy one. Though the devoted Mrs. Thomas Johnson waited eagerly to learn whether her husband had kept his promise to go for a cardiogram "by Wednesday anyhow, I promise you, dear," Wednesday was the night that stretched Paula Hewitt's nerves to the limit. Either the hearty Hewitt was all fun and husbandly cheer or sometime during the evening he would say, "Oh, I almost forgot to tell you. So-and-so's probably going to be in town Friday and wants me to have dinner. I'll have to do it, I haven't seen him in years." He had an inexhaustible list of these mysterious characters. What it meant was that Hewitt's current girl could see him Friday. It was always to be "an early dinner, I'll certainly get the ten-three." Thursday night when anticipation was rising in him he might say, "I think I'll drive in tomorrow. Those late trains are so ghastly." In that case his wife knew that toward midnight Friday he would call up and say, "Look, I've been a bad boy and drunk more than I should have and I really don't want to risk driving out. Do you mind if I ——" Whereupon she took two sleeping pills.

At times the intervals between such Fridays were so long that she thought they were done with, and when on ■ Wednesday the careful overtures began again she first half believed them and then felt too humiliated and spiritless to question them. More recently she had made it a practice to have two Martinis, very dry, before Hewitt's arrival both Wednesday and Thursday, so that she only half heard the casually elaborate details.

It was quite different on Wednesdays at the Titcombs'. The missus got dinner in ■ pretty little silk number protected by a big apron and they had "a nice glass of sherry wine" together before dinner—Wednesday and Saturday only. An evening of cultured comfort over WQXR followed. Looking at his wife, Titcomb would think to himself, I just wish Mr. Rutledge or Mr. Johnson or Mr. Hewitt or some of the other big boys could have a home life like mine. I've seen a lot in my time and though I'm getting old hope to see more, but I never have and never will see anything as pretty as my wife's face and ways. Everything in the world ■ man could want in this little apartment.

Whatever the sad or happy excitement of these people on this Wednesday, it was less than that of the wives of Lowry and Peale, who had lunched together at the Colony and who could hardly wait to tell their husbands of their impressions.

"Jim, I am not exaggerating," Evelyn Peale told him. "She's proposing to do her own cooking, except on special occasions, and to make their beds. I'm not sure, but I shouldn't be surprised if they were going to do the dinner dishes together."

"This may be only temporary."

"Temporary! What will Edward Rutledge think if he hears it?"

"Well, you don't need to tell him. I can speak privately to Stephen."

"It won't do any good. It's some crazy philosophy of theirs. Do you realize that they expect to 'save up' for things? That sapphire of hers and that clip they saved for. They 'saved up' to go to the Pyrenees and buy a car. They seem to have no plan for life."

"Well, it may be a queer one, but it's certainly a plan. It might even be better than spending all we do."

"Are you suggesting I'm extravagant? If you are, I shall be glad to do the housework."

"Don't be touchy. I'm not complaining."

"It sounded that way. Another thing is the way she talks about them in the most adolescent fashion. Of course I like her and I intend to do all I can for her, as I told her; at which she coolly informed me that unless they were working on what she calls their principal errors—they go to libraries and make notes about them—all they like to do after dinner winter evenings is to go to bed and read. I realized on New Year's Eve that she's inclined to be very sexy."

"Is that so bad in a wife?"

"I don't know what you're implying. I do hope you understand I can't become 'best friends' with a foreign woman I don't feel easy about simply because her husband is your oldest friend. I've asked them to dine with us Saturday. The Johnsons are coming, and the Guy Eliots. I had thought we'd have some bridge. But she doesn't play bridge."

"We could play post office," Peale said. "It seems to me you've worked yourself up about nothing."

"Thank you. By the way, the grocer would like a check. And what about the school bill? I'm on a committee there next week, and I shouldn't like to feel uneasy."

"I said I would pay both bills this week, and I will tomorrow."

"Well, you better get dressed. The Dunhams are taking us to the theater."

"Any mail?"

"Other than bills, there's a letter for you—from Venezuela. It's on your bureau."

Left alone, Evelyn, staring sulkily into the fireplace, felt a sense of general irritation with the world and of uneasiness about herself. Life was not easy on $50,000 a year before taxes at the standard she felt herself expected to maintain. Cars, a summer cottage, education, servants, entertainment took so much and you were expected, so at least Jim had taught her to believe, to display a little more each year.

A sense of thin ice under them affected all their relations. She was sustained in part by a bond of martyr-camaraderie with her friends and other wives like her. Even when they had wads of money, most of them wore themselves out with "activities" and some with isms. Those still climbing felt the same stresses she did—so they bought a fine boat, like the Peales' new one, on long-term installments, not for the pleasure it would give them but because it had something to do with business success.

In the absence of all this, it was the sense of contentment about Rosalie which annoyed her. Cows, not women, were supposed to be contented. When Rosalie had told her they liked best to go to bed and read on winter nights, she had asked somewhat coldly what about the summer.

"Oh, the summer nights are rapturous. We lie on the grass and look at the stars."

For all her irritation she wished she could go to Jim and say, "Let's go to bed and read tonight. We've seen that play. I couldn't tell Narcissa so."

The children's nurse came in to say they were ready to be tucked in and she went to the nursery to her maternal duty. She felt a gulf even between herself and them. Rosalie had said most of what she knew of English and American literature she had learned from reading aloud to the children. The Peale children could read; and besides, they had their own television.

Lowry, having comfortably come down in an East Side local to 23rd Street, strode along the cold sidewalks to Gramercy Park in excellent spirits. His second business day had gone well. He had lunched alone with Thomas Johnson, liking him even more than at first sight. Johnson said he had been at a symposium at the Harvard School of Business Administration over the holidays and there had been a discussion of why men "kept at it" so often after the financial rewards had ceased to matter. The general feeling had been men liked the power they exercised. He said in his case he liked his job, he liked his associates, and he had a very happy time in his office. He thought most men with any sense did. He said that prison reform and the rehabilitation of offenders was his greatest outside interest. He had got into it, he was frank to say, because when he was young an older brother of his had served a long prison term.

"When he finally came out we were all hopeless about what he could do. I went up to meet him and while I was waiting I happened to fall into conversation with the Jewish chaplain of the prison. I told him why I was there and how despondent I was. His careworn face lit up and he said to me—I remember his exact words—'After half a lifetime in this work, I tell you most people, including offenders like your brother, have an insatiable appetite, when properly aroused, for the good life and self-betterment. And never forget it.' I never have. We have no children and I've been able, thanks to my wife's feeling about it, to start a foundation, a small one as such things go, for this work of rehabilitation. We live rather simply relatively because of the commitments we've made."

Lowry wanted to ask how the brother had come out, but it seemed too delicate a question to ask.

"Let's go in the other room and have some coffee, though I am not supposed to have it," Johnson said. "Would you be interested in what became of my brother?"

"Very much so," Lowry told him. "I wanted to ask."

"He's the minister of a large church in Kansas City and has served for many years on the state Parole Board. His oldest boy is a Rhodes scholar."

Over the coffee Johnson said that he hoped Lowry would not let himself be rushed about anything, particularly a foreign inspection trip, and "If Edward gets impulsive about it have a word with me. The main thing is to get he feel of the whole business. However, I shouldn't hesitate if I were you to take charge right off and make the decisions."

"I did that with Halleck this morning on that cable from Turkey, where I happened to know the local situation."

"Oh, I am glad you did. Halleck wasn't sure about bothering you and I sent him in. I was interested to know that Jim Peale and you were such old friends. I happen to know another old friend of yours and your wife very intimately."

"Oh, who?"

"Alec Channing, the man with the kindest heart and the most intolerable exterior—'intolerant' may be the word—in New York. It's extraordinary what excellent Intelligence officers stockbrokers make. I told Alec it's because their minds have lain fallow for years while the rest of us wore ourselves out. Though actually I have never been able to understand how a specialist executes an order on the floor."

Lowry laughed. "Neither have I."

"Tell me, where are you living? At a hotel?"

"Oh, no, we were there only for a space over the holidays. We've taken a small apartment in Gramercy Park until summer."

"Well, I think that's very sensible. I'm glad to hear it."

The warm lobby of the apartment was pleasant after the twenty-degree cold outside, and the elevator rose with old-fashioned dignity through the not unpleasant odors of cooking.

As he unlocked his door, Rosalie's head poked out of the kitchen. "Modest drinks in living room in two minutes," she told Stephen. "Darling, it's ages since morning. Sa Puha Jumal, you're cold. I have much to tell you. Oh, these were in that other trunk." And she opened her apron coat on Spanish dancer's pantaloons flared at the ankles and a white Spanish blouse.

"How was your lunch?"

"I have shocked Evelyn Peale and it may ruin your friendship. But dépêche-toi. Oh, the fireplace burns beautifully and the concierge told us where to buy cannel coal on Third Avenue. And, darling, you should have seen me marketing on Third Avenue. Great bags of food very cheap—how good I don't know. You wheel the bags around like babies. But none of the shopkeepers smiles at you as they do at home—I mean in Europe."

When he came into the living room, Rosalie was on the sofa before the fire mixing highballs.

"All go well with you?" she asked.

"Oh, very. Also much to tell," and he sank on the sofa beside her. They kissed fondly and she sank back against his arm.

"This is not," she said, "what the James Peales do when he comes home."

"Poor fellow. What do they do?"

"They dress for dinner with important people. Darling, are you sure you still know Jim? Because the picture you've given me of him isn't Evelyn's. You did think at times in Europe that his letters were getting a little pompous."

"Well, he does seem to think and do the correct thing with a lot of determination. What about Evelyn, though?"

"Well, first, she's unhappy."

"Did she tell you?"

"Oh, no, but she never spoke a happy word or had a happy thought the whole time. She took it for granted to start with that I felt the same way. I think everything I said shocked her. You know, how we bought this blouse and pantaloons while we were walking the Route de Ria to find Pablo Casals' house and how we lay by the Route that night watching the stars. Things like that, or the pictures you took of me in the wild flowers in Rhodes looking across at Asia Minor—well she is either shocked or thinks we're not type sérieux. She seemed to imply that if a man and woman were happy together they were traitors to some higher loyalty. Her life is made up of the most unimportant outward things—money, position, social obligations. What's Calvin Hewitt like?"

Humans, like horses, cannot kick and go forward at the same time.

"Oh, I don't know. Nice enough fellow."

"And they're not particularly happy," Evelyn said. "I met Mrs. Hewitt, who was lunching at the Colony. There's much rivalry between Jim and Hewitt as to who will succeed Mr. Johnson when Mr. Johnson succeeds Mr. Rutledge. The Peales' life is based on his succeeding. Did you know that?"

"He hasn't spoken of it. I should think he'd win easily over Hewitt. But I don't imagine it's imminent."

"I used to think the idea of a man running for President of the United States must be the funniest sight. But everybody's running here. Darling, don't run, just stay still with me. Oh, and I wrote long letters to each of the children. They're open on the desk, so put a postscript on each one."

He sat down at the desk where the three letters were waiting.

"My, you've had a busy day," he said, reaching for a pen.

"When I left Evelyn and Mrs. Hewitt, I made another call. I wondered what they would have said if they knew."

"Where'd you go?"

"The Estonian Relief Committee on East Thirty-fourth Street."

He put down his pen and went over to her. "Nothing?" he asked gently.

She shook her head, her eyes full of tears. "Nothing, except brave people, a little restaurant and an Estonian newspaper and a bulletin board with questions like mine tacked on it. I wrote one, too, and someone had to help me with words I'd forgotten: '. . . Wanted by their sister and daughter, Rosalie Lainvee Lowry.'"

NEW IDEA! TUNA-BAKE

Suggests Elsie, the Borden Cow

1 (7-oz.) can tuna fish ¼ cup chopped onion ¼ cup chopped celery
2 (8-oz.) cans tomato sauce 1 cup water
¾ teaspoon salt ¼ teaspoon oregano ¼ teaspoon pepper
1 cup (4-oz.) elbow macaroni, cooked
1 (1½ oz.) canister of Borden's Grated Parmesan and Romano Cheese

Drain tuna, reserving 3 tablespoons oil. Cook onions and celery in oil until soft. Add tomato sauce, water and seasoning. Simmer, covered 15 minutes. Arrange layers of macaroni, tuna and sauce in greased 1-quart casserole. Sprinkle each layer of sauce generously with Borden's Grated Parmesan and Romano Cheese. It's the only blend of two great Italian cheeses – dry, sharp Parmesan and rich, full-flavored Romano. Bake in moderate oven (375° F.) 20 minutes or until sauce bubbles. Makes 4 servings.

P.S. Borden's exclusive blend of two popular Italian cheeses perks up every hot bite of many casseroles.

And here's an idea. Keep a big 3-oz. canister handy at all times – so your family can shake new cheese excitement on spaghetti, onion soup, hot vegetables, salads, eggs, etc. It shakes easily because the holes are extra-large. Keeps fresh for days without refrigeration. And only Borden's Grated Parmesan and Romano tastes so great!

For 100 years folks have been saying,
"If it's Borden's, it's got to be good!"

When You Shop For Food

OLD FAVORITES with a DIFFERENCE

A filling meat-and-vegetable soup, a luscious lamb-and-Lima stew, tangy trout fillets baked with potatoes—they'll pique the family's interest in late-winter meals!

By MARIAN O'BRIEN

Meals are fun in March, at our house. There is tender new spring lamb in the markets, and bunches of slender, young green onions and water cress (my favorite sign of spring)—and I can see one or two cheery clumps of crocuses through our kitchen window. Suppose we take minestrone as the basis for a really superb spring supper. Ours is full of rich rewards—there are golden carrot cubes, some of those new green onions, neatly chopped, celery and cabbage chunks bobbing about in the steaming, meaty broth, gently flavored with salt pork. The wonderful thing about minestrone is that any vegetable can be substituted here—beets, spinach, cut green beans are delicious—or any of them can be omitted if you haven't them on hand. And I always like to ladle my Easy Minestrone from a lovely old cooky jar. Soup stays hotter in a dish of this sort, and it's welcome as spring's first proverbial swallow—this touch of the unexpected.

Easy Minestrone
Bread Sticks
Salata Mista
Cold Pears, Cream Cheese

Easy Minestrone

Dice ¼ pound lean salt pork quite fine (about ¼-inch cubes) and sauté gently in a deep kettle or Dutch oven until crisp and brown. Now add 2 quarts hot water, 1½ cups tomato juice, one 10½-ounce can condensed black-bean soup, six beef bouillon cubes, one #303 can kidney beans, sauce and all, and one cup each diced raw carrots, celery, turnips, shredded cabbage, new green onions and, if you wish, shredded spinach. (We prefer ours without spinach; however, I've included it here, because true Italian minestrone sometimes includes it.) Now add, for the seasoning, one teaspoon sweet basil, one teaspoon monosodium glutamate and ½ teaspoon salt and freshly ground pepper to taste. Bring to a boil, cover, and cook, stirring occasionally, about one hour. Then I add either ¾ cup raw rice or ¾ cup spaghetti, broken up very fine, and cook about thirty minutes longer, stirring again once in a while. This makes three quarts, about 12 servings, but you'll want that much, so that you will have some for freezing or reheating. Pass a bowl of freshly grated Parmesan cheese with the soup for sprinkling over each serving. Some recipes advise stirring a cup of the cheese into the soup before serving, but we prefer ours the other way; then we can add much or little according to our tastes.

For the salata mista: wash, dry and chill any of the greens—you will find endive, romaine and escarole in good supply at this season—and toss with a dressing of one part tarragon vinegar to four parts olive oil. Add a handful of sliced radishes and four anchovy fillets, chopped, and away you go!

Another easy dinner with a whiff of spring to it is the following menu based on a ragout of lamb and Lima beans. I serve it in a bowl of daffodil yellow. Bordered with a narrow ruff of bright green chopped parsley, it's the prettiest thing you ever saw. (But this stew would be pretty in anything!)

Ragout of Lamb and Limas
Braised Celery
Orange-and-Onion Salad
Gingerbread
Ice-Cream Sauce

Ragout of Lamb and Limas

Have your butcher bone and cut the gristle from a 3-pound piece of lamb shoulder. Then cut up the meat into one- to two-inch pieces. Place in a heavy pan. Cover the meat with two cups water. Add one cup chopped onion, one bay leaf, crushed. Cook, covered, for about one hour. Remove the meat from the broth. Save the broth. Roll the meat in ¼ cup flour to which one teaspoon salt and ¼ teaspoon paprika have been added. Brown the meat in 3 tablespoons bacon drippings until well browned on all sides. Add 2 tablespoons flour and mix well. Then add 18 small peeled pearl onions, one #2 can tomatoes, 1½ cups meat broth, 2 tablespoons minced parsley, 1 teaspoon monosodium glutamate, ¼ teaspoon marjoram, ¼ teaspoon thyme and 1 cup sour cream. Mix well. Simmer one 10-ounce package frozen Lima beans for ten minutes. Drain and add to the meat. Pour into a 6-cup casserole. Top with crumbled bacon and bake for 30 minutes in a moderate oven (325° F.).

Steaming minestrone in a gay cooky jar, doubling as tureen; fresh-grated Parmesan to spoon on top; a green salad with tarragon and anchovies.

Orange-and-Onion Salad

This is a combination to make your family sit up and take notice in the nicest of ways. Just peel the oranges, allowing one per person, and slice crosswise in ¼-inch slices. Arrange on crisp lettuce leaves, and sprinkle with finely chopped green onions. Top with a dusting of coarsely ground black pepper. Add a tablespoon of olive oil, garnish with a few black olives and serve.

Ice-Cream Sauce

Make the gingerbread from your favorite mix. You'll want to add this ice-cream sauce to your regular cooking repertoire. Whip ½ pint heavy cream until thick and glossy. Then, with the same beater, beat one egg until thick and foamy. Beat in 4 tablespoons sugar, a pinch of salt and ⅓ cup melted butter. Fold this into the whipped cream with 1 teaspoon rum flavoring. Chill and serve with warm gingerbread.

For the final menu, the essential thing is a platter with fascination. My own favorite fish platter is cerulean blue and came straight from the florist, filled with a fascinating arrangement of dried leaves and everlasting flowers. When these finally blew away on the household winds, the dish remained—and it cries aloud for trout to fill it.

Trout in Paper
With Tiny Potatoes and Mushroom Sauce
Buttered Brussels Sprouts
Relish-Tray Salad
Pineapple Sherbet
Quick Brownies

Trout in Paper

Cut 4 pieces of aluminum foil, 12″x9″. Fold in half the long way. Thaw 4 frozen trout. Clean and dry, but do not remove heads. Place in a skillet ½ cup water, ½ cup tarragon-flavored vinegar, 1 green onion, chopped, 1 teaspoon chopped parsley and ½ teaspoon salt. Bring to a boil. Place the trout in the pan. Cover. Reduce heat. Simmer gently for 10–15 minutes. Watch closely so liquid does not boil away. When fish are done, remove carefully from pan and drain. Discard broth. When cool, remove heads, tails and skin. Split fish down the back and remove backbone and other bones. Separate each fish into 2 fillets.

Melt 2 tablespoons butter or margarine in a saucepan. Add 1 green onion, chopped, 1 teaspoon chopped parsley and ½ teaspoon salt. Cook gently until onion is tender. Add 1 can undiluted cream-of-mushroom soup. Cook gently until smooth. Lay one fillet on one half of a folded foil square. Spread with sauce. Top with another fillet. Place about 3 small white canned potatoes around the fish. Add more sauce. Sprinkle with paprika and a teaspoon of chopped parsley. Fold the paper over carefully and close with a double fold around all edges. Place on baking sheet and heat in a hot, 400° F., oven for 15 minutes. Serve in foil wrapper. Makes 4 servings.

For dessert I use "store" bought pineapple sherbet, and make my brownies in a piepan and cut in wedges.

Fishsticks HAWAIIAN

2 packages 4 Fishermen Fishsticks
2 cups canned pineapple juice
¼ cup sugar • ¼ cup vinegar
¼ teaspoon garlic salt (optional)
1 teaspoon soy sauce (optional)
9-ounce can sliced pineapple (4 slices)
1 green pepper • ¼ cup water
3 tablespoons cornstarch

Heat fishsticks according to directions on package. Meanwhile, put pineapple juice, sugar, garlic salt, vinegar and soy sauce in saucepan and bring to boil. Cut pineapple slices into four pieces and green pepper in 1" squares. Add to pineapple juice. Blend together cornstarch and water and stir into hot mixture. Cook for a few minutes, stirring constantly, until sauce thickens. Serve hot over fishsticks, with rice if desired. Makes 4 servings.

BACHELOR FOR BRENDA

"That's my problem," Clover said. "An nteresting bachelor for Brenda."

"How about Tiny?" Candy asked.

Clover nodded. "He's the only one, really. ou remember him, Mollie?"

"The Polish giant with a name like a mouthl of olive pits?"

"Timakalowski," Candy put in.

"I shall have to hand him over to Brenda," lover said sadly, "at a stylish little dinner arty on New Year's Eve, in the gracious ome of Mr. and Mrs. Toby Tuckwell. The uests will be Mr. and Mrs. Adam Campbell, Ir. and Mrs. William Stewart ——"

Mollie sighed. "Why does everybody have go to every place always with their hus-ands? Why can't we just once in a while ——"

Inside Candy's mind there exploded that urst of light, resemling the rockets' red lare, which invariably eralded pure inspiraon. She sat up straight. But we can! Let's give wo dinner parties!"

"I don't see ——" Iollie began.

"Two simultaneous arties!" Candy was cared away. "I'll give one ere and Clover can give ie other one in her ouse—and we'll split p every married couple! lover takes Bill ——"

"And you take To-y!" Clover shrieked.

"I'll take Mollie ——"

"—— and I'll take dam!" Clover said, nocking her spectacles deways. "Candy, this the work of sheer gens! We'll start a new shion. We'll shatter utworn social customs ith one blow. 'e'll ——"

"And who," Mollie terrupted levelly, "will ke Brenda III?"

There was a short but ghly charged silence. hen Clover said heroilly, "I'll take Brenda. he's my husband's first ousin."

"Once removed," said andy. "No, I'll take renda."

Mollie said she wished make an important suggestion. "Don't you ink both parties should meet after dinner? ecause if Brenda the Beautiful is going to ork on Tiny ——"

"Of course," Candy agreed. "We'll finish nner about nine o'clock—and then your arty can come over here and we'll all see the ew Year in together."

After a somewhat acrimonious discussion, was finally agreed that Clover would keep er own husband and invite Bill Stewart and Iollie Campbell to her dinner; while Candy ould have as her guests Adam Campbell, ny Timakalowski and Brenda. By the time ill came home the details were complete.

Candy waited tactfully until dinner was ver, and Mollie had gone upstairs in response popular demand to say good night to the ildren. Then, with a combination of offandedness and enthusiasm (a balance exemely difficult to maintain), she told Bill out the New Year's Eve party. As the doubt his black eyes deepened to alarm and then ded to familiar inscrutability, Candy found erself talking faster, sounding more enthusstic and far less offhand. Finally ——

"Don't you think it's going to be fun?"

Bill slowly unfolded the evening paper. andy waited; the back of her neck felt as ough someone had wound up her spine ith a winch. If only just this one time he'd say Yes." If only he'd ——

"Well"—Bill hesitated—"to tell you the truth, I don't see the reason for all this splitting up, but if you do ——"

Candy found that she was breathing rather hard. "Yes, I do. I've explained it all to you—but I knew you'd act like this!"

Bill blinked. "But I like to go to parties with you, Candy. I always have. Particularly"—he grinned at her—"in my own house. After all, you asked me if I thought it would be fun and I ——"

"And you said 'No,'" Candy quavered. "You always do say 'No.' You won't ever do anything new. You just dig your heels in like a—like a dead albatross."

"A what?" Bill looked stunned.

"Well, an ancient mariner. You know perfectly well what I mean. Here's this marvelous idea ——"

"Well, I just don't happen to think it's so marvelous," Bill said reasonably. "But I didn't say 'No'; I just said ——"

"You always throw cold water." Candy was horrified to feel tears burning her eyelids. "You take all the fun out of everything. You ——"

Mollie's steps sounded on the stairs.

"Well, I'm sorry," Bill said stiffly. "Let's forget it, shall we?"

"By all means," Candy agreed with icy dignity, and Mollie came into the living room. She glanced quickly from one face to the other, and said brightly:

"When you've finished the paper, Bill, how about beating me hollow at canasta?"

"Love to!" Bill put the paper down. "Just what I need. I'll get the card table."

Candy went upstairs to tuck in the children. "Love to." Just what he needs, and he'll get the card table. But if I'd suggested it ——

It was early on New Year's Eve.

"Dear," said Candy graciously, "I wonder if you'd mind not using that ash tray? The room is all ready for the party."

"Oh—certainly, sweet." Bill hurriedly took his cigarette over to the fire.

Mollie said to Adam, "Darling, I do hope you're not too tired after that plane trip?"

"Oh, not at all, thank you," said Adam. "I feel fine. Er—do you feel all right, darling?"

"Splendid, thank you," Mollie replied, in a tone of stately cordiality.

"And do you feel rested, Candy?" Bill asked chivalrously.

"Yes, thank you, I am quite rested," said Candy, and found herself bowing her head with benign dignity.

We sound like an evening with Queen Victoria, Candy thought. We all know that I'm simply furious at Bill, and Adam is in a tearing rage with Mollie. I wonder if all married couples behave this way, when they've engaged in battle?

"Well—seven-twenty-five. We'd better start, Mollie." Bill held out her coat.

The sight of Bill escorting Mollie to the gate roused in Candy a very odd sensation. She wrenched her attention back to Adam, who was staring intently after his wife.

"The others will be here any minute," Candy said brightly. "Shall we go and sit down by the fire?"

They sat down by the fire. A heavy silence fell. If only I didn't know him so well, Candy

KNOW SOMETHING

By J. P. WOOD

When Janice says, "Know something?"
And stands there two feet high
And cocks her head and looks at me
With blue and serious eye,

My heart melts, and I say, "No. What?"
"Know something?" Janice says. "Last night
There was a moon,
And everything was light."

"Know something?" Janice sometimes says,
"Know what I did today?
I made a cake and pie for you.
Of course, they're only clay."

"Oh, thanks!" And I wait greedily,
I like clay cakes and such,
Hoping she will say, "Know what?
I love you very much!"

thought desperately, I could ask him how he likes Queenstown, or what business he's in, or ——

"How is Gay?" she asked loudly, and at the same instant Adam said:

"How are David and Sarah?"

"Fine," they told each other with one voice and twin smiles of blinding brilliance.

The doorbell rang.

Candy breathed a passionate prayer to whatever saint was in charge of hospitality, and Luella showed Mr. Timakalowski into the living room.

Candy had never seen Tiny in a dinner coat before; the sight was impressive.

"Goodness—how tall are you, Tiny?" she blurted.

Tiny's carved-looking face broke into a shining grin. "I gnaw—I gnaw. I am the Colossus of the Crossroads. I should be shrank. But"—he turned to Adam—"I am speaking improved new English, no? More words. I shaw you: This evening I am sheveled, no? I am turned up in peccable taste. Am I not? And you, too, Adam."

Adam looked at Candy with a trapped expression—and the doorbell rang again. Luella opened the door, and Brenda Billings swept into the living room.

For a matter of seconds nobody spoke: Brenda was indubitably breath-taking. She was nearly as tall as Adam, and incredibly slender; her pale yellow, gold-encrusted sari bared one rounded white shoulder and displayed every line of her figure. Her hair was crow-black and glossy, her skin creamy, her long eyes liquid. In curious contrast to her exotic appearance, Brenda was as cool and remote as a languid goddess.

Candy found her wits. "Brenda—how nice to see you! I'm Candy Stewart."

"Of course, darling." Brenda's smile was courteous, impersonal and faintly amused. Her dark glance slid from Adam to Tiny Timakalowski, and back to Candy again. She waited.

Hastily, Candy introduced both men; and as they all sat down again, Clover's words came back to her: "As though I'd been in the third grade for years and years." . . . Candy's skin pricked with exasperation and an instinctive hostility. How does she do it?

"—— perfectly ghastly trip," Brenda was saying in her slow velvety voice. She held a cigarette in long fingers, and Adam leaped to her side with a lighted match. "Don't you loathe planes, Mr. Campbell?" Her tone was a lazy caress; she lifted her incredible eyes to Adam (She's got eyelashes like a horse, Candy thought) and dropped them again. The cigarette was lit.

"—— so silly about traveling alone." Brenda turned her superb profile toward Adam, her great eyes upon Tiny. "Last year—it was really too bloodcurdling—I was visiting the Maharaja of Pindarwarl and the angel insisted upon lending me his own plane ——"

Tiny's white teeth gleamed suddenly. "Not this little soocide machine?"

Brenda showed her first sign of animation. "That miniature guided missile! You've flown it, perhaps?"

Tiny's grin broadened. "I am too smott. 'No, no,' I say to the raja. 'Bobo, my friend, old ducks you cannot put into new bottles. Give me the Douglas, Bobo—weeth pilot, copilot, and maybe stoodess.' So safely I wang my way home."

Brenda's smooth black eyebrows lifted. "I thought Poles were so daring," she murmured. "You are a Pole, Mr. Timakalowski?"

"A Pole, yes—but not a full," said Tiny.

Brenda gazed at her feet, bare in gold sandals.

Adam said hastily, "Ah—haven't I seen you on the stage, Mrs. Billings?"

"Brenda," corrected Brenda, and her eyelashes appeared to reach out and stroke Adam's face. "I'm afraid not, Mr. Campbell ——"

"Adam," said Adam.

"Adam," repeated Brenda softly. "Alfred Hitchcock was so cunning about it. He said, 'Brenda, my gel'—you know the divine way he talks—'any time you're hard up, come straight along to me!' But of course I never ——"

"But he should have snapped at you, dear madame," Tiny purred. "With a film, you would be spacktocular. I am ollways telling Alfred he is to weemin like the Paid Piper of Hamlet. Weemin are following him about until he spoils."

With an enormous effort, Brenda lifted her eyelashes, but in the look she gave Tiny there was no suggestion of a caress.

Candy cleared her throat. "That's the most heavenly dress, Brenda."

"Marvelous," Adam muttered reverently, as one giving the responses at vespers.

Brenda glanced down as though to remind herself of what she was wearing. "Oh, aren't you sweet!" she breathed. "Michelle made it, of course—for one of her own models, and nobody else could get into it. Wasn't I lucky?" She

CHAIR

A chair is a movable seat with a back—a form distinct from the divan or sofa, stationary resting places much used in Oriental countries. Chairs were known in ancient Egypt, Greece and Rome, but they were relatively scarce, being reserved for the posts of dignity and state. Stools, chests and benches were the seats of the common people, while the chair was the place of honor of the chief or elder, the officer or the ruler, the distinguished or the privileged in general. This special significance survives in such expressions as to take the chair, to address the chair, to occupy the chair in a university, or to be chaired as a tribute of honor as the winner of a contest or competition. In the sixteenth century chairs were increasing in number, but were still angular and uncomfortable, stately but not easy. In the seventeenth century elegance and comfort became more usual; upholstery covered the whole frame, superseding a loose cushion or two. In the eighteenth century great social changes were taking place. People in general were no longer so deeply concerned with being impressive toward their inferiors, or deferential toward their superiors. Relaxing in soft wide cushions became permissible, and lolling and sprawling became general as times changed and the middle classes became numerous and powerful. The sedan chair, an interesting development, was a vehicle for one passenger, useful in old cities with narrow streets, and borne not on wheels or runners, but by man power with carrying poles. The rocking chair, invented about 1725, is a distinctly American creation and became common about 1800. One of the most amusing sights this writer saw in Spain was a magnificent ducal ballroom, rich in ancestral grandee portraits, crystal chandeliers and priceless antique furniture. In one corner of this splendid formal room stood a row of outsize Boston rockers, ordinary in wood and workmanship. In these alien but restful chairs, said our smiling hostess, would sit the dowager chaperons of stately balls, while youth and beauty circled about over the polished floor. In such ways do the inventions and customs of one country influence another.

dded kindly, "It's an Indian sari, you know, arling."

"Yes," said Candy mildly. "I did know."

"Fine feathers make up for the bird," announced Tiny. "And this is the real Macaw."

"Dinner's ready, ma'am," said Luella from he doorway.

Candy leaped to her feet. Brenda rose racefully. Adam fell over a footstool; and ney went into the dining room.

During dinner, Candy had very little to do, xcept mumble directions at Luella (who, usy with her inventory of the lady guest with er dress half off, paid no attention whatever), nd observe the effect of Brenda's beauty upon ne party. Adam was as totally disorganized s Luella, though possibly for different reaons; but it was Tiny who was most astonshing.

For Tiny, the chivalrous, the protective, the ientle Giant, had become before their very yes both formidable and merciless. After very Name that Brenda dropped, Tiny ropped one more glittering; and every Peronage with whom Brenda was on close erms, Tiny knew more intimately—and aparently since childhood's earliest hour. By ne time Luella had dizzily served dessert, irenda's creamy throat was patched with an nbecoming rose. Adam was eating fast, sayng little, and glowering blackly across the able at Tiny.

The sound of the Tuckwell dinner party oming up the path fell on Candy's ears like ne marching of relief troops to a small, eleaguered army. She opened the door o them; as the others crowded into the livng room, she hissed at Clover, "How was ?"

Clover, having left off her spectacles in onor of the New Year, glared at her blindly. I'm exhausted. I never gave such an awful arty in my life. Bill hardly said a word—just dgeted about and kept crossing his legs. oby stared at me the whole time as though e was sure he'd seen me somewhere before. nd Mollie never stopped talking once. She ept saying 'As Adam says ——' It was posively uncanny. How was yours?"

Candy opened her mouth, closed it, and pened it again. Clover nodded. "'The dear odhpur of Sowhat insisted on giving me his rgest elephant.' I told you so. Does Tiny ant her?"

Candy emitted a short bark. "Tiny wants er dead! Clover, do you realize we have hree more hours of this?"

Simultaneously, they looked at the party. Mollie, ravishing in white chiffon, was sitting iagonally across the room; her eyes were ery bright and her charming mouth was urved into the small, sweet, relentless smile nat Candy knew all too well. Unaware of anger, Adam hovered awkwardly beside renda's chair; Toby and Bill stood stolidly n front of the fire, staring at Brenda like weedledum and Tweedledee. Only Tiny eemed utterly relaxed, completely unconcerned; but his brilliant blue eyes were watchful.

Mollie said flutingly, "Tell me, Brenda—don't you do something?"

Brenda gave a small half shrug, a small half smile. Her eyelashes fell and rose again. (Like somebody hauling up awnings, Candy thought.) Then she said with cool detachment, "I model, darling. Just for fun."

Mollie observed, with an air of cool detachment all her own, "Of course. I suppose you'd be terribly bored if you didn't use your mind at all."

The room stirred a little; only Tiny sat motionless. But Mollie had underestimated her opponent.

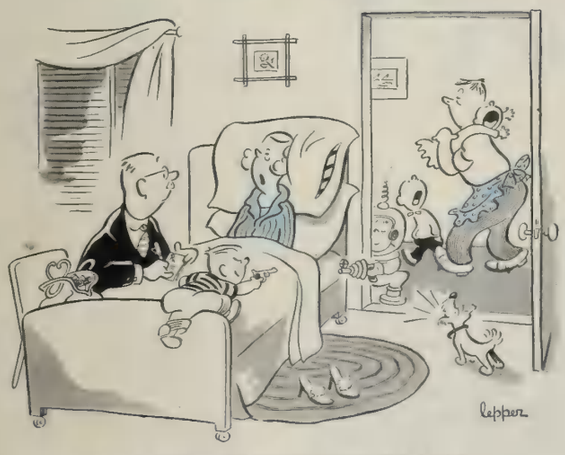
"Oh, darling!" Brenda gurgled. "I don't use my mind to model! As a matter of fact, I haven't any mind to speak of." She directed the full force of her long black eyes at Adam.

"Nonsense!" Adam said hoarsely.

Brenda turned swiftly. "But don't you—er—'do' something, Mollie? Interior decorating, isn't it? Fascinating, I should think. Of course I could never be a career woman. I'm much too old-fashioned; at heart, I'm just a homebody."

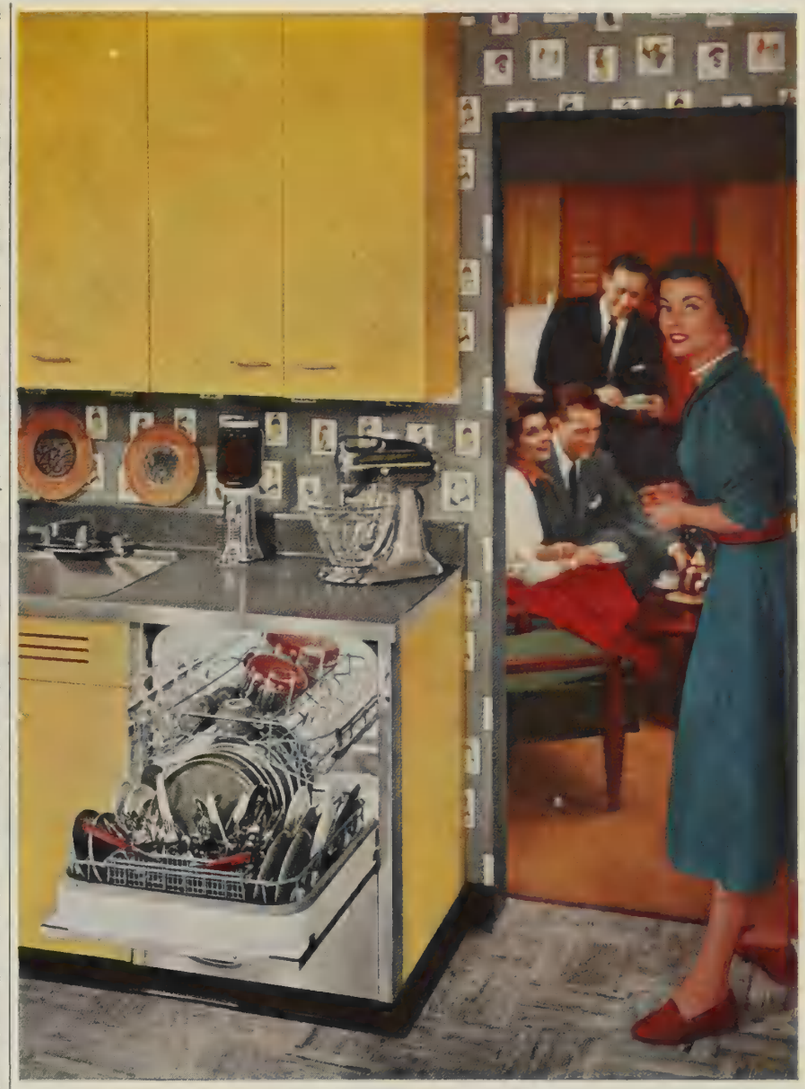
Mollie lifted her extremely pretty chin and laughed deliciously. "Me—a career woman! I'm a wife first and an interior decorator afterward—long afterward." Candy saw a startled movement from Adam. "I've tried it," Mollie went on, "just as an experiment, of course, and it's not for me at all. As a matter of fact, beginning next week, I'm working only in the mornings—just for fun, as you say. The afternoons I shall give to my little girl, Gay, and the evenings, of course, belong to Adam! I do think one's husband deserves one's best self, don't you?"

Candy held her breath. Brenda took out a cigarette and held it poised in her long, exquisite fingers. Tiny leaned over and offered his cigarette case to Mollie, who took one.



"No matter how many—er—selves one has," Mollie added with an enchanting smile. "Thank you, Tiny—and thank you, Adam, darling. I think Brenda needs a match too."

All at once the room was full of movement. Toby Tuckwell was urging Clover to sit down on the sofa. Adam and Mollie were laughing. . . . And the pantry door was closing behind Bill. Candy slipped out of the room and into the pantry.



"Oh, darling," she burst out, "I'm so sorry—this is a ghastly party! It's—oh, Bill, why did you let me?" She looked up at him; his black eyes were smiling at her and his hand closed warmly over her own. "No," she said in a rush, "that's not fair, is it? Husbands shouldn't have to keep their wives from behaving idiotically, should they? Wives have to do that for themselves."

"Don't worry, sweet," Bill said. "We'll save this party yet. I am about to make my world-famous punch."

"What—'Smiling, the boy dropped dead'?" Candy said excitedly. "Goodness, Bill, you

How to stop being a Ghostess

by KitchenAid

You know what a ghostess is: that's a hostess who disappears right after the meal. And leaves her guests with that awkward choice—pitch in with the dishes, or try to ignore those stacks of soiled tableware.

But change the scene just slightly... add a KitchenAid automatic dishwasher... and see the hostess be a part of the party! Now she has time. Time for gracious entertaining and living. Time to really enjoy her family. Time for so many of the better things.

Why a KitchenAid? Because a KitchenAid belongs in this scene. Because the product itself is unequaled.

Ask friends that have one. You'll hear them echo our own proud claim: "The finest made." Or an expert—a dealer. He'll explain that a dishwasher has two important actions. Washing (it must remove every trace of food). Drying (it must leave no spots). He'll show you why a KitchenAid, by Hobart, does both jobs better—the revolving power wash arm, the separate electric blower-dryer unit—no other make has either one! Compare these superior features with ordinary "splasher" type or "needle-spray" washers... see the big difference for yourself!

But of course you're concerned with appearance, too: "How will it go in my kitchen?" The answer—beautifully! Your dealer can provide the model, style and finish you prefer, the color you wish... your new KitchenAid will take its place in your kitchen as naturally as it fits your way of life.

"Leave it to me. You go and get tray—glasses—ice," Bill ordered. "And put the kettle on."

Candy paused in the kitchen door. "I always thought that men were supposed to be the visionaries. You know—dreamy, impractical ——"

"Only," said Bill, "about unimportant things, like the future of the human race." He bent suddenly and kissed her. "You give wonderful parties, sweet."

"When you're at them," said Candy, and rushed into the kitchen.

"What is in this?" Adam demanded enthusiastically, taking his second cup.

"White wine?" Mollie suggested, tasting carefully.

"And brandy," Toby added with relish. "I'm sure of that."

"I am testing vodka!" said Tiny in a muted roar.

"Is that all?" Clover Tuckwell asked in a high voice.

Bill looked sinister. "There's a secret ingredient."

Clover drank, considered deeply, drank again, and then screamed triumphantly, "Tea!"

Gently Brenda put down her glass. No one paid any attention.

Mollie said, "Plus a scant cup of deadly nightshade, I think."

"And a li'l' ole smidgin of vanilla." Clover giggled—and kept on giggling. Toby looked at her carefully.

"Baby?" he said.

Clover jumped and stared at him. "Wh-what?"

"You're tired, baby," said Toby. "You haven't been looking right. I'm going to take you home—the others will see the New Year in."

"Oh, but Toby ——" Clover began weakly.

Tiny stood up, filling the room with h craggy vastness. "Toby is right, little Clover For you, it is Home, Home on the Wrench.

Clover got up: the relief in her face was un mistakable. "Toby will come back, won't you Toby? To take Brenda home."

Tiny smiled. "Brenda I will esquirt my self."

But Brenda had moved gracefully to th door. "I think I'll go along with Toby an Clover. You won't mind, will you, darling Actually, that plane trip ——"

"I've got an awfully good detective story can lend you," Mollie said sweetly, "if you're going to spend a long, lonely evening."

Brenda faced her from the doorwa "Thanks, no, darling. Unless I am special stimulated, I always go right to sleep. It's great blessing."

"Oh, for everyone," Mollie agreed co dially. "I mean, of course, everyone wh can. Good night, Clover, my pet. I do thin Toby is right."

Tiny watched the three departing guest disappear into the darkness. "That Clove she is a love child, no?" he said fondly.

"Well, no," Bill told him firmly. "Def nitely no."

"But Brenda," Tiny said. "This Brenda- she is not what you call the Mother Hubb type, yes?"

"Tiny," Mollie demanded, "tell me: excep for her looks, what has Brenda got to offer man that we haven't?"

Tiny drank a glass of punch. As he put t glass down, immense crystalline tears welle up in his blue eyes and rolled down his fa onto his immaculate shirt front. He made n attempt to hide them, or even to wipe the away. They continued to fall steadily; Tin said, smiling through them like a rainbo across a waterfall:

"This is because I am Polish, and life mak us sod; people makes us sod. Brenda mak me sod. You say what has Brenda to give man—but the beeg question is: What can man give Brenda? Not himself—no. It only one thing Brenda wants: a picture Brenda. Men are for her not men—but mi rors. Ollways." He sat down and mopped h eyes. "She does not gnaw—Brenda—wh fun is to be a wooman. Sometimes wick, some times strong, but ollways herself." He ble his nose. "You three—Candy, Mollie an leetle Clover—you gnaw this. You are weem Why is nobody offering me this delicious looking little cakes?"

Benne biscuits were pressed upon Tiny, wh stood, raising his glass. "I am making toast

"Do, Tiny dear," Mollie urged.

"To weemin!" said Tiny. "Because they a here to stay!"

"Happy New Year!" said Bill.

"You know, in many ways," Mollie o served with an air of dispassionate justic "men are really rather remarkable."

Clover and Candy considered this.

"Well, they're logical," Candy conceded.

"And courageous," Mollie added gene ously. "For instance, they don't have perm nents. They just have hair."

Clover said in a ruminative way that course when you came to think of it men cou do pretty extraordinary things, like changi the flint in a cigarette lighter. "And parki backward and left-handed. Or right-hande whichever it is I mean."

All three pondered this. Then Mollie mu mured. "Parking is such sweet sorrow," a Candy observed, with an air of discovery, th their vocabularies were extraordinary too. mean words like 'sump pump.'"

"And 'grommet,'" contributed Molli "What is a grommet?"

Clover, the small-boat sailor, replie promptly, "Sort of a metal eye."

"Like Brenda's," Candy explained. "Bren gave Tiny the grommet."

This, mysteriously, unhinged their reason Mollie, wiping her eyes, said, "One thing m never do is giggle. They're so factual. Po things, what they miss! Maybe Brenda is fi on facts."

"Brenda is fine," said Clover, "on the fa of life."

"Those old things," said Mollie. "Let's ha some coffee."

eeks. Day and night. Night and day. Two 'clock in the morning, for instance. Six 'clock in the morning, too, for instance. nd he can be very difficult about it. Some-mes the pediatrician says the baby needs take five and a half ounces of milk and e'll take only four and a half. Then you ave to stay up an extra hour or so, hop-ng that maybe he just has a bubble and then e'll take one more ounce. You have got to et that one ounce into him at all costs, or he ill die of starvation, or get rickets. Coax im, urge him, beg him, and above all pay no ttention to your husband, who is now stand-ng around urging you to go back to bed and leep. What does he know about babies?

If, after all your efforts, the baby absolutely efuses the rest of his milk, call the pediatri-ian. He'll be glad to chat with you at three 'clock in the morning. He was just sitting round with nothing to do anyway.

A hamster is fed daily. His food is placed in is cage, and he can eat it whenever he feels like t. It is not necessary to weigh or measure it.

A baby's things must be very clean, or he ill get terrible germs. It is wise to boil every-hing he comes in contact with. The little bot-le of water for him to drink, for instance, nust be boiled constantly. You never know when he might want a drink of water, and wa-er spoils rapidly, even when carefully refrig-rated. (Of course how you're going to know when he wants a drink of water is another uestion, as he can't talk. Still, a bottle of wa-er is a good thing to keep around to be one of he things you can try when he cries and you lon't know why. He won't want the water, of ourse, but it kills time.)

The only way any woman may remain forever young is to grow old gracefully. DR. W. BERAN WOLFE

Boil the baby's little vitamin droppers and poons and rattles and stuffed animals. Boil is clothes and boil his diapers. Boil the little lass jars that hold his cotton swabs and safety ins. Boil his bootees and caps. And when he's ld enough to crawl around in the park and ut all the gravel and grass in his mouth, you o right on boiling all his things at home. You vouldn't want him to be dirty, would you?

Presently, if the weather is fine and mild and he baby has obligingly gained some weight, he pediatrician will announce that you may ow take him out for an airing in the carriage. However, the pediatrician has no understand-ng of the problems involved. He has said you nay take him out, but he has not explained when or how. After all, you can't jounce a aby around in a carriage too soon after he as eaten or he may "spit up." In a brand-ew infant, digestion is not always absolutely ertain which direction it's going in, and "spit-ing up" is the euphemism describing the re-ulting confusion. Incidentally, baby raising is raught with euphemisms like this which you night as well get used to.

The question is not may he be taken out, but ather, can he be taken out? Perhaps it would e best to wait. It's a little cool today anyway, nd the wind is coming from the east. After ll, there is oxygen in the house, isn't there? Open a window, and wait a month or so. No eed to rush things. If you start letting him o out now, what will he have to look for-vard to when he's eighteen?

Besides, if you do manage to get the baby ut, how many sweaters should you put on im? First ask the baby's father. Then ask a randmother or two. Then ask a couple of unts. After you've had all their opinions, ut on as many as you possibly can.

Some new mothers call up the pediatrician nd ask him how many sweaters the baby hould wear, but this is foolish. He doesn't know how windy it is in your neighborhood. The best way is just to go out, tucking several extra sweaters and blankets in the foot of the carriage (along with a milk bottle, a water bottle, some vitamins—in case he develops anemia on the way—and a first-aid kit, some diapers, some oil, some cotton swabs, some pins, a few extra crib pads, a couple of stuffed toys, a few milligrams of ascorbic acid and a freshly sterilized rattle) and then talk it over with all the mothers you meet outdoors.

The first mother you meet with a young baby has only one sweater on hers. She is toughening him up. "You've got yours much too hot," she says. "He'll get all perspired and then he'll catch a cold." She seems very authoritative about this, so you remove a few sweaters. The next mother you meet has six sweaters on her baby—"It's so chilly today. Aren't you afraid your baby will get pneumonia? He looks a little blue already."

By the time you get the baby's clothing and blankets adjusted to the proper warmth, it's time to go home and take them all off again. And you can feel well satisfied with the outing. The baby has had lots of exercise.

A hamster requires no clothing of any kind.

In the beginning, all you have to cram into the baby is milk and vitamins, but one day the pediatrician will say, "Now you may start the baby on mashed banana." Or baby cereals. Or something mushy. Here again it is easy enough for the pediatrician to say it. He doesn't have to come and get it into the baby. That's your department. Should you feed him the mashed banana before he drinks his milk, when he's very hungry and therefore more likely to try something new? Or, if he's very hungry, will something other than milk make him very angry and unable to take solid food as long as he lives? Or if you give it to him after the milk, when he's feeling full, will he reject it because he's not hungry, and never in his entire life eat solid food?

In fact, is it even possible to feed a baby anything but milk? This is a crucial moment. The baby cannot go through life living on milk. The doctor has spoken. You have got to get that food into him. Get on the phone again. Consult all your relatives who have ever had babies. Go out and consult all the other mothers in your neighborhood. Ask the elevator man on the way.

You will soon find that you are the only one who has any difficulty in the matter. The first mother you meet didn't give her baby mashed banana. She gave hers cereal. What kind of pediatrician do you have anyway? And there is no problem about when to give it. She gave hers the cereal before the milk, and the baby didn't like it, but she got it into him anyway. "After all," she says, "the baby doesn't know what's good for him." The second mother didn't give hers solid food till he was six months old. What kind of pediatrician do you have, anyway? And she gave it after the milk, and he loved it the very first time. The third mother gave hers strained liver when he was only four weeks old, and what kind of pediatrician do you have anyway? She gave it in the middle of the feeding. It made him throw up, but after all, it's the experience that counts.

So you go home again, and you try it before the milk, during the milk and after the milk. But yours doesn't like it any time. So you try cereal. He doesn't like that either.

Now a problem has developed. Here is this baby and he refuses to eat his solid food. ("Solid" in this case is a euphemism for "squushy.") Are you a failure as a parent? Is he a failure as a baby? Is the pediatrician a failure as a pediatrician? Would the baby rather have a hot pastrami sandwich?

This brings us to the primary rule of baby raising, which is the solution to this and all subsequent problems. This rule must be followed faithfully, and you should make it a habit to repeat it to yourself ten times a day. It is the Golden Rule of raising babies. LIE. Lie to your mother, lie to your sisters and aunts and, above all, lie to all the other mothers you meet on the street. When a newer mother than you asks for your help, tell her you never had the least trouble. Your baby just loved his mashed banana on the first try.

The age at which a baby walks varies greatly with the individual, some managing it by a year while others may wait till they are eighteen months old. Some babies creep or crawl first at varying ages, some stand up first. I myself had a child who learned to sit when he was six months old and then never did another thing till he was eighteen months old. He never crawled or crept or stood up or moved around and, what's worse, he didn't even care. He just sat there with his two parents standing over him imploring him to move around just a little bit, and he just went right on playing with his little pegs and blocks and laughed. He didn't care that every other child in the park was galloping around pushing little push toys and pulling little pull toys. He just sat and smiled. After a time, we got into the hands of a capable neurologist who treated us with sedatives until the child got up and started pulling the lamps off all the tables. It was during this period that I was first working on THE RULE.

We proceeded to have a second child who crept around at five months and was pulling the lamps off the tables by a year. However, in spite of all this activity he didn't walk till he was eighteen months old either. This entirely proves my point, which, in the face of the entire medical profession, I still believe to be true: LAMP TABLES SHOULD BE STEADIER.

During the first week or two after the baby is born, some mothers have a baby nurse to help out. Others must make do with a grandmother or other unfortunate relative who is unwillingly pressed into service.

The grandmother is not necessarily antagonistic, but the professional baby nurse must be handled cautiously. Her sole aim, in her job, is to protect the baby from the doctor at all costs. Your doctor does everything exactly the opposite of the way she has always found best. What kind of pediatrician do you have anyway? Furthermore, your own ideas on child raising are simply the result of inexperience, and though she is amused by them, naturally she wants to set you right as soon as possible. If the doctor says, "Put the vitamins in the milk," she will suggest that it is far better to give him the vitamins on a spoon. Actually the baby is likely to survive no matter which way you do it, but you don't know that, and she knows that you don't know it. However, as you don't know that she knows that you don't know, the entire situation becomes extremely complicated.

If the baby develops a slight rash during the ensuing argument, and the doctor recommends ointment A, she will immediately announce that she has always used ointment B and has every intention of doing so now, as the baby is her responsibility during the term of her employment. The natural solution is to terminate the employment at that very moment, and try ointment A. When it doesn't work, and that perfidious doctor now suggests ointment B which does work, you can go to the drugstore and get ointment C as you have now broken out in a rash yourself.

The firing of the nurse is an excellent prophylactic measure, and once she is out of the house the wounds will heal rapidly. In a few months or years you will find yourself back in that same robust health you enjoyed before.

However, first you must get through the teething and the toilet training before you can get to the eighth square and be a queen.

Some babies have considerable trouble with teething. They may cry a lot and be fretful, and wake during the night for no apparent reason and in general make more fuss than you do for the extraction of an impacted lower third molar. Don't let the baby fool you. No matter how much he cries during the appearance of his first little incisors, they can't possibly hurt him all that much. He's just making a big fuss over nothing and acting like a baby. Sometimes during this trying period a little paregoric, judiciously used, is helpful. If you drink a lot of it, it will help you to sleep through the baby's crying. Some people rub paregoric on the baby's gums, but after all, let's not be silly.

The most important question that arises between the ages of one and two is, "Does he stay dry yet?" and the mother who cannot answer "Yes" must go to the back of the park and study Spock and Gesell and fold diapers. No matter what happens from now on, she has lost caste. It is therefore necessary to get your baby trained before any of the others so that you can be the one to ask the question first and feel the natural pride in your baby that is your right. After all, what did you get him for if not to be able to brag about him?

In trying to train a baby, the first step is to provide yourself with still another euphemism—a toidy seat. This object is intended to keep the baby from being alarmed and is actually designed for his own protection. However, immediately upon spotting it he becomes strongly suspicious. He thinks that someone is trying to civilize him and break his spirit. Your job, therefore, while strapping him firmly into the little seat with buckles and ropes and chains, is to convince him that you are totally disinterested in whether he ever becomes civilized or not. Evince utter nonchalance during the time he is sitting there. Hum, inspect your fingernails, pluck at the loose thread where your skirt is coming down, and when that ungrateful baby fails you utterly, there is always THE RULE to rely on. THE RULE will never fail you.

It is extremely noticeable during the first year or two of baby raising that the house, which up till now you have thought of as a sort of home, has become increasingly filled with junk. There are folding bath tables in the bedrooms, playpens in the living room, high chairs in the kitchen, wash lines and drying racks everywhere, and baby carriages in the hallway. It's discouraging.

As the baby grows you can gradually start to get rid of some of this. He is outgrowing the baby carriage, the playpen and the bath table, and he will soon outgrow the crib and the high chair too. However, the baby carriage is soon replaced with a tricycle, the playpen with a desk, the high chair with a little table and chairs, the crib with a bed, and so on, and in addition you now have a phonograph, a rocking horse, a swing hanging from a doorway, and any minute now you are going to find yourself with microscopes, punching bags, and a hamster in a cage on a bureau.

The hamster requires no special toys or furniture. What's more, he doesn't need a pet.

Worst of all, just as you were about to get rid of all that stuff and clear out the house, the next baby, or sibling, arrives, throwing the first baby into a perfect fury, throwing the house into a state of chaos, and throwing the parents into a state of shock, for they have now only two choices: to find a bigger place to live, or to sleep snuggled up on a couch in the living room. The only member of the family who is now possibly better off than he was before is the new baby, and he doubts it.

Whatever experience the parents gained from the first baby—and it was plenty—can now come in handy, and make the raising of the second a snap, as they will know exactly what to do in each situation. At least they would if that foolish baby would only stick to the rules so carefully established by the first baby. You'd think he would. He has the same parents, the same crib, the same toys—but no. This one has to be an individual for some blockheaded reason, and this one, though perfectly willing to eat his mashed banana, will not drink any milk.

For the next few years utter chaos ensues. It not only ensues. It positively pursues, overtakes and finally outdistances you.

No two members of the family eat the same food at the same time, no two get up or go to bed at the same time, and the only thing you can count on their all doing together is making more laundry than ever before. This brings us to the second rule, which is extremely important. Do not go on to the next lesson until you have thoroughly memorized this rule. Write it a hundred times, and say it over to yourself at odd moments while you're feeding the baby and putting all the books back in the bookcase for the fourteenth time. The rule is, OH, WHAT'S THE USE? Say it to yourself right now. There, doesn't that help a lot? Say it when the older child spills a whole glass of orange juice on his overalls for the third time that meal, say it when the baby rubs his spinach in his hair, say it when your husband comes home and says he's tired of hamburgers for the fourth night in a row. Say it when a child steps on a graham cracker on the living-room rug just as you put the carpet sweeper back in the closet, and say it every night, with feeling, just before you go to sleep. And when the baby wakes you a half hour later, it won't hurt a bit to say it again. He doesn't understand English anyway.

Table manners are nonexistent in infancy, and progress yearly to worse, worst and absolutely abominable. Of course you can't expect too much of a small baby. Table manners and etiquette are not inborn, and at the beginning you will simply have to wash the strained carrots out of his hair and ears for him, as he does not yet know how to use a napkin. Indeed, if you were to give him a napkin, he would probably just throw it on the floor anyway. Of course by the time he's nine or ten, you can certainly give him a napkin to use, and he will not throw it on the floor. He will drop it on the floor.

Table manners are extremely important, as any adult member of a civilized society knows. We must all observe certain rules of conduct at table or everything would be a complete and utter mess. And that is exactly what it is when there is a child at the table—a complete and utter mess dominated largely by catchup. Indeed, one of the primary rules in breaking children to the table is to keep all knowledge of catchup from them as long as possible. Catchup is one of the most dangerous of all foods in consistency and color (as well as the case of the first child, it is not so to keep him from learning about catchup. will not find out about it until he is old igh to visit another child's home for n. After that, of course, his eyes will be ed, and you can no longer hope to keep om him. But in the case of succeeding lren, the oldest child is likely to spill the s, and you are then faced with the impos- situation of a child of two or three know- about, and insisting on using, catchup. her dangerous foods are potato chips ch break, fall on the floor and are promptly ed on), peanuts (which leave mounds of s and little brown papery skins on the '), milk, plain or chocolate (which leaves s all over the place), and the ice-cream or ice-cream sandwich or ice cream on ick. These are all foods to be avoided the child is twenty-two or -three, and he ld then eat them outside the home.

ne of the few real advantages of having nly child is the possibility of keeping him relatively safe diet of lamb chops and burger until he is old enough to handle more dangerous items of food. Corn on cob is another food strictly to be avoided ong as possible. I have seen corn cobs fly en or twenty feet in the hands of a deter- ed child, striking a cat with considerable e at the end of the flight. Sometimes the g cob may strike the glass and china on table before reaching the cat, overturning cream pitcher and the catchup bottle, and ering considerable butter which then gets tively embedded in the cat's fur. And she desperately idiosyncratic animal who hap- s to detest butter in her fur.

s a matter of fact, there is no food which ot without certain hazards. A skillful child get pretty good distance with a piece of t beef or a particularly buttery bit of aragus when he really tries. A good simple hod of coping with these problems is to k entirely to frankfurters without mustard, and raw carrots, both of which can be firmly grasped in the hands and are neither drippy, gooey, brittle nor crumbly. The frankfurter is a bit buttery, of course, and the roll a bit crumbly, but life has its sorrows and you cannot expect to raise children without some trouble.

During the early years of childhood, the children eat alone in the kitchen, well shrouded in plastic aprons and bibs and helmets. The mother, too, is thoroughly hooded and gowned and shielded for the fray. But after a time the mother feels that it is time for the children to start to learn to eat properly, and to learn by example through watching the parents. Besides, she is good and sick and tired of fixing two sets of meals at two different times, and feels it would be worth almost anything to be able to cook one meal for the whole family.

Unfortunately, what happens is that the children's manners improve not one whit, as they now have access to more dangerous foods, and after a time the parents' own manners deteriorate to the point where even they start knocking over milk glasses and mustard pots. The fact is that when you have said for the third quiet, patient time, "Move your milk glass back from the edge of the table, dear," and nothing has happened, the quietness and patience are apt to dissolve into, "For heaven's sake, will you move that glass?" And as you reach to do it yourself when there continues to be no response, there is a crash, and a splash, followed by a dash for a mop. For you have succeeded in knocking over not only the milk glass, but the sugar bowl, the cream pitcher (Limoges), a glass of tomato juice and a little pannikin of melted butter, to the intense delight of the children who shriek merrily and resolve to knock over lots more things because it's such fun! What a good time everyone is having!

Of course as the children grow older, their co-ordination develops amazingly. They become capable of building tiny exquisitely fine model ships, preparing a section of a fly's wing for a microscope slide, winding the coil for an electromagnet, soldering neatly and cleanly or making thirty yards of horse reins without dropping a stitch. Yet the minute they approach the breakfast table, shredded wheat is behind their ears, in the farthest reaches of the pot cupboards, in the cat's bed. (And that same idiosyncratic cat doesn't like shredded wheat in her bed. I think you ought to get rid of that cat—she's a troublemaker.) And the table is embellished with little heaps of sugar in a lake of milk. Pretty. "I couldn't help it," they say plaintively, should you venture to complain. "It was just an accident." Yet those same hands that are not capable of pouring milk from a pitcher into a bowl of cereal were only yesterday carefully and delicately hitching up the wires of a radio set without a slip.

Some children early in life develop rigid likes and dislikes when it comes to food, and no matter how much you may explain to him that a well-brought-up child eats whatever is put in front of him, he will starve rather than touch a turnip. (And I can't say that I blame him either.) He feels the same way about spinach, broccoli, carrots, asparagus, peas, string beans, Lima beans, wax beans, rutabagas, Jerusalem artichokes, beets, Brussels sprouts, cabbage, cauliflower, eggplant, mushrooms, parsnips, squash and tomatoes. And he hates parsley. It will do no good whatever to tell him that some child in China or India would be glad to have it. He will simply reply that he would be delighted to let the little child in India have it.

You could try forcing him to eat the parsnips by shoving them into him with brute force. But he might then get the perfectly crazy idea that he not only hates parsnips, but parents too. On the whole, probably the only thing to do is wait till he gets beriberi (which is imminent) and then say, "See? I told you so." Or, he may turn out to be immune to beriberi, and you may simply have to resign yourself to the awful fact that a malevolent fate has inflicted on you a child who will never, in his entire life, eat parsnips. Here you may well use Rule 2.

Some particularly sneaky little children like to make out that they don't eat anything at all, and get their parents perfectly frantic. They sit down at the table at mealtimes, and toy with their food until the parents turn blue with frustration. Alas, the parents don't know that this pathetic little creature has just partaken of: two slices of bread liberally coated with peanut butter, three stalks of celery, a glass of chocolate milk, half a package of Spanish peanuts, two chocolate almond bars, most of a pound of cherries, three slices of bologna and half a package of cereal. Sometime the next day the mother will call the pediatrician, as she does regularly, to complain that her child will not eat, and she doesn't see how he can survive.

This is a hopeless situation. The mother will never find out the truth, because the child is no fool—he knows that if he tells what he ate, he'll be scolded for spoiling his appetite just before dinner. This whole family will go through life believing that this particular child lives on air. He weighs eighty-two pounds, but his mother is convinced that he is starving to death, and terribly fragile. Oh, well. That's the way it goes sometimes.

There are all kinds of parents. They are all, from their own point of view, perfectly wonderful, intelligent, understanding, self-sacrificing people. They are all, from their children's point of view, horrible monsters who are too strict, ignorant, old, ill-tempered and cruel. Some parents really are the one, some really are the other, and most fit somewhere in between. (I myself naturally fall into the first category, as I am always sweet-tempered, helpful, loving, kind, tolerant, loyal, beautiful, a superb cook, elegantly groomed, soft-spoken, well-mannered, and good at algebra. In short, I am a perfect mother. Ask anyone. On second thought, just take my word for it.)

Among the vast majority of average parents, the mother is apt to be more indulgent than the father. The father is traditionally the disciplinarian. When the child runs over the mailman with his tricycle, leaves the scene of the accident, shows little remorse (even though the mailman's shin is barked) and when finally cracked down is just about to run over an old lady, the parents react differently.

"But he's so little," the mother says. "He didn't mean to do it. He's an angel, really. He'd feel terrible if he really hurt anyone." (He wouldn't, actually.)

The father says, "He's a born criminal. He should be punished so he'll learn a lesson. He's headed straight for reform school. If you let him get away with this sort of thing now, he'll be holding up garages by the time he's twelve."

This simply demonstrates that both parents are absolutely nutty. The truth is that the child is one of that vast number of perfectly mediocre children who are neither angels nor criminals. He simply doesn't know how to steer very well, and what the parents should do is to let him practice steering in the family car till he's skillful enough to handle a tricycle safely. Not all children are expert tricyclists. Perhaps this particular child's gifts lie in another direction. He might be better off taking up the study of classic languages for a while till his father cools off, and the mailman's shin heals.

Hamsters do not ride tricycles.

Discipline is, in any case, a knotty problem for most parents. The question is, which acts require discipline, and what degree of punishment should be inflicted?

Spanking, hitting with old sneakers, throwing andirons, locking the child in a dungeon with nothing but bread and water for a week are frowned upon by modern child psychologists. And by modern children too. (Frowned upon for the parents, that is. These things are simply the signs of a healthy, outgoing personality on the part of a child.) For one thing, it may give the child a feeling that someone is angry with him. And for another thing, he may hit back, and he is getting awfully strong.

Some modern parents solve these problems by sitting down quietly with the offending child, reasoning with him, explaining why his act was wrong, and then discussing the suitable punishment. In this way the child is made to understand clearly just what he has done that is wrong, and as he has helped to decide on his own punishment, his resentment toward the parents is greatly lessened. However, this resolution of the problem, though possibly excellent for the child, is less so for the parents, who retire to their room with a blinding headache and an ice bag.

Perhaps the best way to handle these problems as they come up is to react to the situation by flying off the handle, blowing your top, turning blue and screaming till exhausted. This leaves no doubt in anyone's mind that the parents are displeased by the child's little misdemeanor, including the neighbors for three blocks around. This method of dealing with infractions of rules has several advantages. By the time the parent is through screaming he is in such a state of exhaustion that he is too limp to bother thinking up a punishment. The child (who has long since learned to ignore the screaming) thus gets off scot-free. The parents are so conscience-stricken at having overshot the mark (after all, all the child did was to start a neighborhood "confidential" magazine) that they later apologize to the child, and buy him a new filter for his camera to make it up to him. Everyone is happy.

Of course far better than punishments is preventive discipline, in which you warn the child ahead of time that Mrs. Willoughby down the street is crotchety, and doesn't like children riding their bikes through her rhododendrons. Suggest that they ride their bikes through Mrs. Hemingway's evergreens, as she is away for the summer anyhow. This avoids later quarreling and punishments.

There are some children who are not always by instinct absolutely clean and neat. Some parents are distressed by this rakish, devil-may-care attitude on the part of their children, and wonder how in the world, when they themselves are so extremely neat, their children have acquired such very untidy ways. They are further distressed when the accumulated rubbish and debris of the child's room overflows the bounds and comes billowing down the stairs and spreads out into the living room, the dining room, the kitchen, the back hall, the stair well, the front-hall closet, the cellar, the front porch, the back porch, the linen closet, the attic, the laundry, the parents' bedroom, all the bathrooms and the front yard.

These children have a peculiar ability to pick their way through mounds of rubbish, without squashing too many things, look bewilderedly about them, and say, "What mess? Where?" Or, equally, they may look down, puzzled, at a T shirt stiff with paint and soft-boiled egg and root beer, flick at it with a finger, and say, "Dirty? Where?" They may also look you straight in the eye, with a clear, frank, open countenance, and say, "Of course I brushed my teeth," with the evidence of the dry toothbrush not two feet away. They do sometimes, at gun point, wash their hands, but only the palms as far as the wrists. That is the rule. They will not go beyond the wrist, nor would they consider it playing the game to wash the backs of the hands. However, as few parents have a gun permit, most of these children never wash their hands at all.

The child's room is a sight to make strong men faint and induces in mothers a condition characterized by trembling, pallor, dysphasia, weakness, hyperchlorhydria (which is associated with the ulcer that has just developed) and hyperbulia.

The room is characterized by litter to a depth of two to three feet, except under the bed where it is perhaps only six inches deep. You can see no article of furniture, each being buried completely and emerging as simply a higher mound of rubbish. You once, many years before, saw an occasional bureau top (let me see, was it maple?) or a desk top (birch—I think), but alas, they are only a memory now.

Some parents feel that this situation is entirely hopeless, and that they must resign themselves to living in a sea of clutter till the children get married, or at least run away from home, or go to sea, or join the French Foreign Legion, or something.

Others attempt ineffectively to stem the mounting tide by periodically carting rubbish out of the house in grocery-store boxes and crates. This is usually futile, because the child stands by wailing piteously, "Don't throw that away—I need that." "That" happens to be a collection of peculiarly repulsive torn and sticky balloons for which he has some unimaginable (but intensely important) project in mind, like melting them down in your oven and creating something wonderful out of them. In fact, each loathsome object that you dare to touch turns out to be something really necessary. You can't throw those away—those are his bottles that he is going to fill with colored water. You can't throw that tattered old rag away—that's his favorite hand puppet. You can't throw out that beat-up old orange crate—that's his mouse house. And so on and so on and so on, ad infinitum.

Sometimes a few small bits of torn paper or a broken crayon actually is removed from the child's room, whereupon the other child instantly pounces on it with glad cries that it is just what he has always wanted, and drags it off to add to his own collection. Often there may be a complete interchange of possessions and sometimes for a moment or two while the exchange is going on and things are being stirred about, you may for a moment or two, if you are alert and look sharp, find a tiny bit of floor to sweep. Of course if you don't move fast enough, it gets covered up again and the chance is gone for months—possibly years.

Some mothers treat this problem by standing in the hall (which is, as a matter of fact, the only place they can find to stand) and screaming. This method, though giving remarkable relief to the mother, gives little relief to anyone else and fails utterly to result in any improvement in the children's rooms. Oh, dear.

Another method which I have experimented with myself is to turn on the vacuum cleaner and first let it suck up anything that will fit in the nozzle. Then reverse it, stand back and let it blow. Something always does result from this method—that I guarantee—but the result may be unpredictable.

My husband's method is one which you may wish to try for yourself. In this method, the parents prepare a little bundle on a stick, give each child fifty cents, and tell him he is now old enough to be on his own. Pack a toothbrush and a clean pair of socks and one clean set of underwear in his little bundle. He'd never dream of using them, but it's wise to put them in anyway, in case the S.P.C.C. decides to interfere. Should this fail, you can try leaving the children at home, and prepare a little bundle for yourself. However, in this case you'll need a great deal more than fifty cents.

The average intelligent, thoughtful, careful, educated, loving parent wants his child to have a healthy, outgoing personality, and strives in every way to accomplish this, even going so far as to read the complete works of Gesell & Ilg, Spock, Levine, Freud, Reik, and so on.

The only trouble with this endeavor is that it is entirely wrong. These misguided parents are reading the wrong books. The only really good book on the subject is this one.

Actually, a sickly, ingoing personality is far more desirable than a healthy, outgoing one, especially from the parents' point of view.

What really is meant by a healthy, outgoing personality? It means that the child is going to clutter up the house with hordes of horrid little friends, all drinking soda pop, stomping up and down the stairs, engaging in nefarious activities like wrestling and sliding down banisters, putting their grubby little hands on your new slip covers, playing phonographs, filling your kitchen with chemical equipment, screaming, slamming doors, and generally making life unbearable.

On the other hand, a child with a sickly, ingoing personality who isn't well rounded at all, but merely well focused on one particular interest, will come home quietly after school, with no friends at all. He will quietly help himself to his soda pop, go to his room and read till dinnertime. The house is peaceful, quiet, ungrubby and prosperous. For this child doesn't need the baseball bats, the swim fins, the Pogo sticks, the roller skates, the bicycles. All he needs is to be taken to the public library once in a while and he's happy.

How do you help a child to achieve a sickly, ingoing personality? This is something that is worked at gradually by the whole family, and you can't accomplish miracles overnight. Most often it is the parents themselves who must change their ways, as children learn more by example than by teaching. Active parents who go springing about on tennis courts or running around and flinging balls and making their blood circulate are not going to be very successful at raising ingoing children. These people should practice going limp all over until they have lost some of their excess muscle tone. Then when Saturday comes around and all the other people are organizing picnics and ball games and getting all sticky and red in the face, the ingoing family can stay comfortably at home, reading and playing a snappy game of chess.

If your child is unfortunately already an outgoing type, due to your having too assiduously read your Spock and Gesell, and having carelessly allowed him to grow up with his spirit untrammeled, it isn't too late to start now to correct this condition. When he brings friends home from school tell them they may not stay to play and caution them not to slam the door as they go out. It's a start. And the saving in refreshments alone will get your taxes paid up before you know it.

Most parents realize the importance of healthy, happy, wholesome family fun, in which all the family take part. This helps to give the children a sense of belonging. I don't know what it gives the parents.

A great many parents would like to spend time with their children and play with them, but actually don't know how. Really, there are many games for the whole family, in which every member can participate, even the smallest. As the sizes of families range from very small to utter madness, all my suggestions for games are carefully planned to be suitable for any number and for any ages.

A rainy Saturday or Sunday afternoon is the best possible time for family fun, and here is a game you will all enjoy. It requires no equipment other than pencils, paper and a phonograph. Each member of the family sits on the floor, forming a circle. They then count off by twos, thus forming two teams. Just to make it more exciting, give the teams names, like the Tigers and the Bears, or the Lilies and the Azaleas. One of the children (and this is an excellent job for the littlest) may hand round paper and pencils. Another child then starts a record on the phonograph. Any good record will do, though Duke Ellington is a better choice. The parents have previously hidden in their pockets thirty-five cents per child. When the music starts each player writes as fast as he can all the rivers of South America beginning with the letter Y. Allow about ninety seconds for this. Then the child tending the phonograph turns it off, and collects the papers and pencils, the parents distribute the thirty-five cents to each child and the parents choose to see which one drives the children down to the movie house for the kiddie matinee complete with chaperon. They're showing The Monster From the Moon and The Horror From Outer Space, which should be a good double bill.

Another simple little game that the whole family will enjoy is one that we play often, as it requires no special equipment. In this game, the father offers a prize to the child who can maintain absolute silence for the longest period of time, and the prize increases with the length of time the game lasts. Some children become quite adept at this game, learning after some practice to keep silent for as much as ten or twelve minutes at a time. This game is not only grand fun for everyone, but is truly educational as well, for if the prizes awarded to the winners are halfway decent, the children learn from practical experience that SILENCE IS TRULY GOLDEN. Sometimes caramels or jawbreakers judiciously offered just before the game starts can help to prolong the fun.

Another jolly little game that we all enjoy is called "hide." This is similar to "hide and seek," but in "hide" the children all run and find good hiding places. While they are hiding, the parents settle down comfortably in the living room and read the Sunday papers. This is a game that is full of merriment for all, as well as being wholesome and beneficial to the parents.

The minute a baby is born, certain health questions arise and do not lie down again for a long time. It is important for the mother to have an understanding of the rules for maintaining health, and a knowledge of how to handle the minor illnesses that should not require the services of a doctor.

IRONS MOST FABRICS WITHOUT SPRINKLING

Changes instantly from "steam" to "dry"

Look at all the features—the many downright handy features of this steam iron. It irons without sprinkling, everything except heavy cottons and starched fabrics. You press like a tailor—without a damp cloth. The secret's in General Electric's Even-Flow steam system. Steam is steadier and far more penetrating.

Use it as a dry iron. It changes instantly from "steam" to "dry"—no need to let the iron cool down, or even empty the water out.

The handy Dial-the-Fabric control prevents scorching. Gives you the "just right" temperature for every ironing job.

he very first question in the mind of every mother (and every old mother too) is, "ow much should a baby sleep?" The answer simple. A baby should sleep as much as is nanly possible. What else has he got to do? ring the first few weeks he should sleep all -time, just waking up long enough to get ugh milk into him to put him back to sleep in. That answers how much a baby should p, if he has any consideration whatever his mother. But how much does a baby p? Unfortunately the answer to this ques- n is not simple, as the amount of sleep ies from baby to baby. The usual amount ot enough to give the mother enough sleep, even time to finish folding the diapers and ilizing things.

When the baby is a little older and no longer ps all the time between feedings, how ny naps should he take? Well, he should e three. He should have a really nice long in the morning, and two decent ones in afternoon. However, some babies get ng with only two naps. Some get along h only one nap. Some get along with no s at all. That is the kind of inconsiderate ies I raised. However, they got along utifully. I didn't get along nearly so well. As the child grows older and passes the ping age, the next question of course is, ow much sleep does a school-age child re- ire at night?" Not wishing to be unscientific out this important question, I didn't de- nd on guesswork or my own limited experi- e. I went right to the children themselves, d asked about a hundred children of this what time they went to bed. So, from the rse's mouth, I can answer that question ctly. The proper bedtime for a school-age ld is one o'clock in the morning. (Perhaps I ght to state, in the interest of scientific ac- racy, that although I personally directed s research, the actual questioning was done my children.)

The second most urgent question in the nd of the new mother is, "How much ould a baby eat?" The answer is simple. He ould eat as much as you can stuff into him, eferably more than any other baby in the ighborhood. If he doesn't, simply remem- r Rule 1. As he grows older, the problem anges somewhat. He may go through the ges during which he may appear to eat thing at all, but he will surely, sooner or er, go on to a third stage in which the oblem is, "How can we afford to go on feed- g this monster?" For he has suddenly turned to a bottomless maw which is constantly aving third and fourth helpings with count- s between-meal meals. This is possibly the ost trying time of all, as the food bills ount and the mother is in a state of exhaus- n from carrying home all that peanut tter. The parents, meanwhile, have taken to ting less and less, and permanent worry es have developed on their foreheads below e mother's graying hair and the father's ceding hair.

here are certain minor illnesses which the other should be able to recognize and treat th little difficulty.

The most common is the head cold. If a ild starts sneezing and his nose starts run- ng, he may very likely have a cold in the ead. On the other hand, it might be the begin- ng of measles, chicken pox, mumps, whoop- g cough, German measles, roseola or allergy chicken feathers. As a matter of fact, ere's really no telling what it might be. If at e end of a week he is all better, chances are was only a head cold. However, if at the d of a week he is all covered with spots, it ay turn out to be measles. In any case, the ost perfectly scientific, medical, hygienic, nsible treatment is to put the offending child bed and give him an aspirin and a pile of mic books.

Keep in mind that comic books should be administered with caution, as they can sometimes lead to unexpected side effects such as drowsiness, nausea, and so on, and may even, in some cases, have a deleterious effect on the brain when given in large doses too frequently. When in doubt, or at the first indications of any of these symptoms, change the treatment immediately to a dose of real, old-fashioned, hard-cover books which may be obtained without prescription at any good library.

In the event of stomach-ache, nausea, pallor, fever, and so on, the diagnosis is simple. He either ate something or he's coming down with something or it's a virus or maybe it's appendicitis or maybe he's taken an overdose of peanut butter or maybe—well it could be almost anything. In the meantime you can be perfectly safe in putting him to bed and not giving him an aspirin till the doctor comes and says it's either something he ate, or a virus, or he's coming down with something, etc., etc.

He feels perfectly fine, but he is covered with red spots. In this case it's very likely poison ivy. Or maybe it's poison oak. Or poison sumac. Maybe it's chicken pox? Measles? German measles? An allergy to fish? Mosquito bites? What in the world is it? A person doesn't just break out in red spots for no reason at all, does he?

A bruise is easily recognized by a characteristic blackish-bluish mark on the skin. It is not necessary to put the child to bed when he exhibits this symptom.

A cut is easily recognized by a characteristic cut appearance of the skin. If it is also bleeding, you can be almost certain that a cut has taken place. Stick a bandage on it.

Many children get mumps, measles, chicken pox, and so on. It is quite possible to live through these episodes. However, should the father come down with them, too, my advice to the mother is to escape to some remote mountain region of South America and start life all over again. As a spinster.

Isn't it remarkable how soon babies come to the conclusion that everything is to be eaten or at least tasted – from toes to toys – fingers to food – crib bars to bonnet ribbons. New mothers often worry about this, but by and large this nibbling does no harm since most things baby touches are spanking clean. On the plus side: the mouth is baby's first great teacher. With it he learns taste, texture, shape and one of the great pleasures of life: the enjoyment of good food.

Speaking of Taste and Texture

Here's smooth going for baby's mealtime. Gerber Strained Bananas, like all good-tasting Gerber Strained Foods, have a delicate flavor and the smooth, nice-on-the-tongue texture that appeals to unsophisticated palates. Only fully ripe fruit (secret of easy digestibility) is used . . . and special processing preserves fresh banana flavor and appealing color. Best of all, you are assured of a uniform, just-right degree of ripeness.

Foolproof Way to Tub a Toy

Before sudsing baby's favorite squeak toy, place a strip of adhesive tape over the squeak mechanism to prevent water from damaging the merry noisemaker. Important: when buying toys of any kind check the labels for assurance of washability.

How to Turn Sighs to Smiles

Even the most contented babies suffer from plain old-fashioned crankiness, from time to time, for no apparent reason. A few helps:

- Change of scene. A social session in another room usually works wonders.
- Music hath charms. Background radio music will often lull a little one.
- Fun and games. A bit of a romp often helps baby exchange whimpers for gurgles of glee.

Suggestion for a Sit-up Baby

Has baby arrived at the sit-up stage? Remember that those little back muscles are weak at first, so try not to leave him propped up too long at a time. Watch for these fatigue signals: slumping forward or sliding from buttocks to small of back.

Feature of the Month

(BREAKFAST BLISS FOR BABY)

Gerber Strained Orange Juice
1 Serving of any Gerber Cereal
(Rice, Barley, Oatmeal, Cereal Food)
2 tablespoons of Gerber Strained
Egg Yolks

Serve orange juice at room temperature. Mix cereal with milk or formula, fold in egg yolks and serve. The result: a good-tasting breakfast that gives baby the benefit of these important nutritional factors: iron, calcium and important B-vitamins in the cereal – vitamin A and protein in the egg yolks – precious vitamin C in the orange juice.

Sibling rivalry is a condition that is rampant in middle- and upper-income families of the United States, where it was invented by child psychologists. In the lowest-income groups, where it is not against the rules for the parents to slug it out with the children, it is less commonly found.

At the very beginning of sibling rivalry, when it was first invented, people believed that the prevention or cure lay in cosseting the oldest child and presenting him with little gifts until he became accustomed to the baby. However, when the baby then fell victim of the disease, it seemed that there was no cure possible and sibling rivalry would have to be considered as inevitable as death and taxes. This, as it happens, is true. However, I intend to show the condition can be alleviated.

Many parents faced with this situation do not know how to cope with it correctly, as they do not have sufficient understanding of the basic causes underlying this difficult emotional phenomenon.

In nearly all cases of sibling rivalry the main cause is the birth of a second child. Once having acquired an understanding of this underlying cause, we can go on if we keep our chin up and make a real effort.

The birth of the second baby causes feelings of antagonism and insecurity on the part of the first child, who expresses these feelings in direct physical form, thus causing feelings of antagonism and insecurity on the part of the second child, followed by feelings of antagonism and insecurity on the part of the parents. THE FAILURE OF THE PARENTS TO ACT ON THESE FEELINGS IS CALLED PARENTAL LOVE.

It is wise to prepare the first child ahead of time for the arrival of the second baby. (It may be wise for somebody to prepare the parents too.) Plans should be carefully made so that the home life will not be too much altered by the second child, so the first child will not feel that the new baby is threatening his place in the family. This means, of course, that the new baby should refrain from crying and demanding attention while the older child is around. He should be made to understand that he ought not to get hungry and need feeding at a moment when the mother is busy playing a game with the older child, nor should he attempt to divert the mother's attention from the older child by such obvious methods as needing a diaper change.

There. That takes care of that. Now if someone will just think up a way to assure the second child that the first is not a threat, we'll be all set.

Should these methods fail, and sibling rivalry occur, there are steps that can be taken.

The first rule in sibling-rivalry control is to SEPARATE THE CHILDREN AT THE FIRST SIGN OF ANY BLEEDING. Secondly, DO NOT PERMIT THE USE OF FIREARMS. Third, NEVER LET A ROUND LAST MORE THAN SIX MINUTES.

It is important that the parents show no favoritism. When the children have one of their little altercations, be fair. Listen carefully to the plaintiff and the defendant. Make it clear to the children that they must be calm and not raise their strident little voices. Only parents are allowed to scream.

When each child has had a fair chance to tell his side of the story, and each has had a chance for a rebuttal and a summing up, and when the whole thing has become utterly incomprehensible (except that it all began because the defendant refused to allow the plaintiff the use of his woodburning tool, with which the plaintiff had intended to burn a beautiful design into the woodwork of his room—which is at present very ugly, being just plain, freshly painted white—on the grounds that plaintiff had, only three weeks before, refused defendant use of his scissors with which he had intended to cut out some pretty designs on his plain green bedspread, and name calling had ensued) you may throw back your head and howl. This helps to keep down blood pressure, which may have been rising rapidly.

After this, the best way to settle the problem justly is to go out the front door, slamming it behind you, and go buy a new hat, preferably expensive. Get one with lots of feathers on it—that's the best kind.

There. That'll teach those foolish children not to squabble.

Of course you must understand that a certain amount of little quarrels and tiffs is normal and natural. Remember that the children really love each other underneath it all. (All right, boys. Go to your corners. Round Two is over.) They really do.

The main thing is to make certain that each child feels secure in his parents' love. Yes, I love you, Rosemary. I love you, too, Billy. I love you, Ermentrude. I love you, Sam. I love you, Marguerite. I love you, Harry. I love you, Bettina. I love you, Arthur. I love you, Clarissa. I love you, Bertram. I love you, Dorothy. I love you, Carl. I love you, Elizabeth. I love you, Montmorency. I love you, Yvette. (Elizabeth, give Carl back his penknife; Carl, give Marguerite back her paper clip; Marguerite, give Harry back his notebook; Harry, give Billy back his toy truck; Billy, give Yvette back her eyeglasses; Yvette, give Montmorency back his baseball bat; Montmorency, give Dorothy back her diamond bracelet; Dorothy, give Bertram back his typewriter—don't throw it; Bertram, give Rosemary back her shotgun; Rosemary, give Arthur back his Siamese fighting fish; Arthur, give Bettina back her socks; Bettina, give Sam back his unabridged dictionary; Sam, give Clarissa back her eyelash curler; Clarissa, give Ermentrude back her snowshoe; Ermentrude, give Elizabeth back her chignon. For heaven's sake, brush it off first.) When each child is thus assured of his parents' love, the sibling rivalry disappears. (Who threw that candlestick at Montmorency?)

Sibling rivalry does not always take the obvious form of quarreling over possessions and privileges. Sometimes it may be expressed in attempts to gain the attention of the parents by, for example, seeing who can be told the most number of times to pick his napkin up off the floor or who can get the most stitches in his head or who has the most cavities or, most commonly, who can catch the most colds and it counts extra if the cold is accompanied by a fever. These pitifully obvious efforts to attract attention should be frowned upon as they benefit no one but the doctor and the dentist and they've already been to Europe.

Sometimes the older child torments the younger by refusing to answer questions, merely saying monotonously over and over, "Shakespeare never repeats, why should I?" or "If you don't know I won't tell you." This drives the younger child to a frenzy of frustration, the mother out of the house, and the cat under the bed. I spent an entire childhood with an older sister so devoted to the sentence "Shakespeare never repeats, why should I?" that my entire personality became permanently warped and developed a decided starboard list.

A frequent cause of sibling rivalry is the fact that one child has straight hair and the other wavy hair. (Whomever could I be thinking of?) Or that one fortunate child gets to wear braces on his teeth while the other has to make out as best he can without a wire or rubber band to his name.

An even more frequent cause of trouble between children is the fact that, in some families, the older children are somehow larger than the younger children. This causes feelings of inferiority and helplessness in the younger ones, not in the least alleviated by the older ones' being allowed to stay up later, ride their bikes farther, get a bigger allowance and be in a higher grade at school. It may help if you have the smaller children in the family first.

Sibling rivalry is deepened and exaggerated by having children all of the same sex, by having children of opposite sexes, by spacing the children farther apart, by spacing them closer together, by having fewer children, by having more children, or by giving one a red toothbrush and the other a blue toothbrush. It is important for parents to understand these factors, and to take them into consideration before making any move at all, unless it's to a larger house.

We have all heard of heredity and environment and the part they play in the formation of the child's character and personality.

Heredity is an extremely complex subject, far too technical for the average nonbiological person to understand. Stated in its simplest form, it is that when two brown-haired parents suddenly give birth to a red-haired child, everybody has to rack his brain to remember Great-aunt Sarah on the father's side and Second Cousin Mildred on the mother's side, both of whom were violently red-haired, or people are going to think it's funny. Unfortunately, having now remembered Great-aunt Sarah's red hair, you may also now remember her terrible temper, her disagreeable habit of telling people exactly what she thought of them, and her susceptibility to hives, and wonder if this redheaded child you have just produced is going to inherit these tendencies along with the red hair. However, as Second Cousin Mildred was an easygoing type who slopped through life with her slip showing and got along wonderfully with everyone, it's hard to say.

When you consider that for every dominant factor showing in the parents (such as brown hair, curly hair, brown eyes, and so on) each parent might or might not also be carrying a recessive trait (blond hair, blue eyes, and so on) you can see that having a baby may be considered to be, at best, a complete gamble. When you further consider that, in addition to the two parents, this baby also has four grandparents, eight great-grandparents, and so on, the possibilities are staggering.

When buying a hamster or a kitten, you may look them over carefully, and choose the most active and alert one with the prettiest fur, the brightest eyes, and so on. (It is difficult to look over a baby ahead of time.)

Frequently, when two people marry, they are complete strangers to each other. (Actually this is a good thing, as it often takes weeks or even months before they find out that the other member of the marriage never puts his cigarette stubs really out.) So it often happens that a surprised parent will find himself the possessor of a baby about whom his wife's family exclaim in amazement, "Why, he's the very image of Aunt Hannah!" and the puzzled father has never even heard of Aunt Hannah before. This can be disconcerting until his own family appears and joyfully announces that the baby actually looks comically like his paternal great-grandfather, which is even more puzzling, as this particular great-grandfather had a full beard, and it's hard to say what he looked like. However, everyone is now happy except the baby, who is hungry and cross and wishes everyone would go away.

The arrival of each subsequent baby is greeted by exclamations over his remarkable resemblance to or dissimilarity to all previous children of these same parents, and either way it is considered to be highly unusual. I was so unlike my older sister that all I ever heard as a child was, "She doesn't look anything like her sister, does she?" This I understood to be a disparagement of my excessive height, straight brown hair, large feet, slitty eyes, and so on. The very same people who were so astonished at this difference between us are now equally astonished by the strong resemblance of my own two children. "My," they say in wonderment, "they certainly do look a lot alike, don't they! Why, you can hardly tell them apart!" (This is perfectly silly, as one is half a head taller than the other and two years older.) I take these remarks to be a disparagement of my ability to produce highly individual children, though I do feel that my husband should bear part of the blame.

The instant that fertilization of the ovum has taken place, heredity is all over the lot, and everything from that point on is intensely irrevocable. That baby is going to be whatever has been allotted to him in the shuffling of the genes or chromosomes (I told you this was highly technical) and he's stuck with it. (Now take my hair, for instance. No, never mind.)

However, a lot can be done to help matters. As soon as the child is born, the parents should start a special savings account for the orthodontist and the analyst. And never forget that a good hairdresser can work wonders. (That is, for everyone but me. I've never found a good hairdresser who would accept the challenge of my hair. They're afraid I'll spoil their reputation.)

The hairdresser brings us to environment.

Environment is far easier to understand than heredity. Once you understand exactly what heredity is, environment is everything else. A simple scientific experiment will prove that heredity is far and away the most important factor, with environment running a poor second. Take a newborn baby. Look at him. No, really look at him. There, you see what I mean? Born stubborn. And there isn't a thing you can do about it except dig your heels in for the struggle.

For the past twenty or thirty years, desperate parents have been driving themselves mad. They took children who were happily gifted

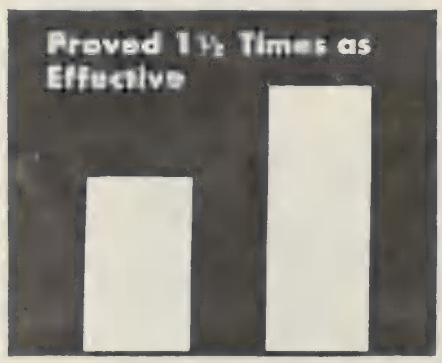
New ARRID with Perstop*
Stops Perspiration Stains — Stops Odor

DRAMATIC STEAMBATH TEST SHOWS HOW

ARRID with Perstop* was rubbed into this woman's forehead. Then she was put in a steambath at 104 degrees. Fifteen minutes later . . .



. . . she was dripping with perspiration—but ARRID with Perstop* kept her forehead dry. ARRID will do the same for your underarms, too.

Just rub ARRID in—rub perspiration out. Rub ARRID in—rub odor out. When the cream vanishes you know you're safe even on hot, sticky days.

ARRID with Perstop*, used daily, keeps your clothes safe from ugly stains, keeps your underarms dry, soft and sweet.

Doctors have proved ARRID with Perstop* is 1½ times as effective as all leading deodorants tested against perspiration and odor.

th athletic ability and tried to turn them o good spellers, and they took children th a gift for music and tried to make accom- shed diving experts out of them. While Mrs. is unhappily saying, "Oh, if only Billy could ay tennis as well as Jimmy!" Mrs. Y is just unhappily saying, "Oh, if only Jimmy could ad as well as Billy!" Now if Mrs. X and rs. Y will just relax for a minute, I can make em both happy.

The latest scientific word on this whole mis- able subject comes directly from the labora- ry of the world's foremost expert—me. I ve made an enormous and intensified study this question, although unfortunately I was able to acquire only two children for my work, due to circumstances beyond my con- trol. (Let me see that checkbook. I could have sworn there was enough left for that oil- burner repair bill.) The results of ten years of devoted slavery in my laboratory prove con- clusively that all good qualities in a child are the result of environment, while all the bad ones are the result of poor heredity on the side of the other parent.

There. Now that lets all us parents off the hook, and we can all go back to sleeping at night.

It is a curiously unknown but readily ob- servable fact that as the children grow up, the parents' I.Q.'s go down. This is best stated in a simple mathematical law: The parents' I.Q. is in inverse ratio to the square of the children's ages. Any natural law is a statement which most accurately describes an observed phe- nomenon. This law, which I like to call Smith's Law of Reciprocal Stupidity in the Parent- Child Interrelationship, describes the phe- nomenon noticed in every family in which the parent replies to the child's questions, "Huh? Whadja say?"

This law is a direct contradiction to the pre- viously stated belief on the part of psycholo- gists that the intelligence quotient is a perma- nent indication of mental ability, regardless of learning, education, age or other changing fac- tors. This error on the part of the intelligence testers was a naïve and wishful thought, due, no doubt, to insufficient testing. The parents were not available for testing as they were all home doing laundry, playing cassino with minors, feeding babies strained squash, and so on, all of which can be very well done on an I.Q. of 60 to 80. The error is doubtless also due in part to the fact that the psychologists were parents themselves.

As the psychologists have failed to explore this phenomenon, I have had to go into the matter to a small degree myself and I have come to the following inescapable conclu- sions. The parents' I.Q.'s start plummeting on the day of the first baby's birth and continue to plummet for years and years and years un- til suddenly one day they wake up and there they are—middle-aged, and with the mentality of a bright ape.

The parents do not notice the change at this time, as they are too busy. Fortunately the tasks at which they are engaged (opening and closing little stair gates, blowing up inflatable toys, mixing flour and water, finding lost roller-skate keys, cutting fingernails, doing jigsaw puzzles with four pieces missing, play- ing dot games and ticktacktoe, picking up po- tato chips from the floor, and so on) do not require their former high intelligence. And as they are likely to associate mainly with other parents in the same condition, the low state of their I.Q. continues to go unnoticed. It is when the children get to the fourth and fifth grades, about, that they first begin to notice that something is wrong.

The discovery is first made when a child comes home from school and demands help in dividing four hundred and eighty-seven by ninety-two. How in the world can this be ac- complished? Ninety-two clearly won't go into forty-eight and there isn't a zero in sight to help out. Somewhere a cog has slipped. You can solve the problem for a while by explain- ing that you're busy helping his younger brother with his horse reins (which he intends to sew into a little coat one of these days when he gets through making two hundred plaster spaniel dogs that he is making with a mold he has, which he will paint nicely and sell for five cents apiece, which will net him hundreds and hundreds of dollars with which he can buy more wool for longer and longer horse reins) or that you're busy helping the baby who is having trouble nesting six plastic hollow blocks (and it's hard).

But it won't help for very long because soon he comes home again and wants help in mul- tiplying three eighths by seven ninths. You console yourself by telling yourself that this is perfectly silly as no one is ever, in real life, go- ing to have to multiply three eighths by seven ninths. In fact, all the arithmetic you've needed to know for years and years now is how to subtract $141 from $412, and even that isn't hard as all you have to do is write out the check and the bank will be glad to do the arithmetic for you. Sometimes you subtract $412 from $141, and then the bank will do the arithmetic even faster for you. You'll hear from them before the ink is dry on the check. The bank is your friend. Nevertheless, the dis- covery that you cannot do this simple arith- metical multiplication is disquieting, as you are perfectly certain that you once were able to do it. Another cog has slipped.

Oh, well, it's only arithmetic.

Then one day a sweet little voice says, "Mommy, what is a participial clause?" and all you can say is, "Huh?" Or "What were the events leading to the War of 1812?" and you say, "Well, uh." Or, "What is the real sig- nificance of the Jones-Robinson Act of 1922?" At this point you are faced with the ineluctable realization that you really don't know a thing,

All this time those children are sopping up foolish information. They're learning to figure out if one pound of peaches costs twenty-nine cents, how much will a pound and a half cost? (There's really no need for this. The man in the supermarket will write it on the paper bag for you.) They are figuring out things like how far a fly will go if he keeps flying back and forth the length of a freight train that is going from New York to Buffalo at sixty miles an hour. They are learning to mispronounce words like Himalaya. (They say Him-a-lay-a, when everyone knows it should be Him-ahl-yuh.)

You may find it helpful to mislay your eyeglasses frequently.

Remind them you are the only one in the family who knows the recipe for brownies.

Tell them that you really know the answer, but for their own good you would prefer that they look it up for themselves. Explain to them the importance of learning to use reference books and libraries.

When all else fails, keep reminding them that although your algebra may be a trifle rusty, and your French verbs have momentarily forsaken you (though they'll surely be right back at any moment now), and your European history is just a little weak, and you've sort of forgotten the main points of American history, and your Latin has kind of gone, and your chemistry has just not been in use lately (though it's all just on the tip of your tongue and any minute now you'll be able to come up with the formula for water), still, they haven't yet acquired any wisdom. You simply have to keep plugging away at this. Remind them of it constantly. Point out to them daily that you are older than they are and you have learned a great deal that isn't in textbooks.

If you believe in the Lord, He will do half the work—but the last half. He helps those who help themselves.

CYRUS H. K. CURTIS
The Forbes Scrap Book
(B. C. Forbes & Sons Publishing Co., Inc.)

Most people believe it is important to help children to develop a sense of responsibility in the early years so that later, as adult men and women, they may become good citizens and useful members of society. A sense of responsibility can be developed even in younger children. It has to be, because otherwise a child will come home from school, having lost one of his shoes, and upon having his attention called to this slight disorder in his dress, he will say carelessly, "It was Susie's fault." He threw his shoe at Susie, and Susie refused to pick it up and return it. (Susie has no sense of responsibility either.) When last seen, the shoe was being taken home by a beagle who lives in quite another part of town. (The beagle is the only one so far with any sense of responsibility. At least he knew better than to leave a perfectly good shoe lying around on a playground.)

In order to develop this sense of responsibility, the child needs to have a feeling of importance, a feeling that trust is being placed in him. (Of course he should only have a feeling that trust is being placed in him. You don't want to carry this character building too far, or there won't be a shoe left in the house.)

One way to help the child develop reliability and responsibility is to establish an allowance which he must learn to spend in a sensible way on his own needs.

The weekly allowance is pretty much a universal custom, but the big question is, "How much?" Of course this depends greatly on the age of the child, the number of children in the family and the economic status of the father. It also depends greatly on how much Peggy gets. (It doesn't matter who Peggy is. Peggy is the mythical character brought into every family discussion. Peggy gets $20 a week for spending money. Peggy is allowed to stay up to watch Dragnet and Medic every week. Peggy goes to the movies all the time. Peggy has chocolate milk for breakfast. Peggy's mother lets her have supper in the television room. Peggy can't read. Peggy smokes cigarettes whenever she feels like it. Peggy drinks coffee. Peggy is seven years old.) However, in the puzzling question of how much allowance to give, there are two simple rules by which you can guide yourself. The first is to keep close to the standard established by the other families in your neighborhood. The second is to give what you think is the proper amount regardless of what the other families do. If you keep these two rules clearly in mind at all times, you can't go wrong.

The hamster is never given an allowance as he simply stores it in his pouches and the money is then permanently out of circulation, which is not good for the economy of the country.

Remember that in the matter of allowances, the amount of money is not important. It is the idea that this money is entrusted to the child to spend as he sees fit. It helps him to learn the importance of spending wisely, the importance of saving, and the impossibility of buying a good camera.

When the allowance is decided upon, the parents must discuss with the child just what he is expected to pay for with this money. Is it purely spending money or must he also pay for his own school supplies, camera film, and so on? Let us take, for example, a child whose allowance is twenty-five cents a week. Should he simply squander this money on toys, games, microscopes, tricks, crayons, stamps, ice-cream cones, encyclopedias and other foolish things? Or should he pay for the lost shoe? (Should Susie pay for the lost shoe? Should the beagle pay for the lost shoe?) If this child is allowed to grow up without paying for that shoe, he may go through life losing shoes without ever feeling responsible for them. On the other hand, at twenty-five cents a week, he will be without shoes for quite a while, and the neighbors may think it's funny.

It is important for the parents to maintain their hold on reality at this time, and to put out of their minds all memories of five-cent ice-cream cones, five-cent jelly apples, five-cent candy bars, five-cent magazines, five-cent subway fares, five-cent telephone calls and five-cent cigars. It is also important for the parents to put out of their minds all thoughts of savings accounts, winter coats and the other fripperies of their youth. It is simply not realistic to expect a child these days to take care of all his needs, clothes, carfares, lunches, spending money, and so on, on an allowance of a quarter a week. If you expect all that, you will have to raise him to fifty cents.

Every child should take his share of the family's work around the house and grounds. In this way he learns to share responsibilities with the other members of the family unit. There are many jobs that even the smallest children can do, such as emptying wastebaskets and ash trays, watering plants, feeding pets, and then later they can advance to helping to make the beds, raking leaves, shoveling snow, washing windows, watering the lawn, raking the gravel in the driveway, and so on. Any child can certainly help with setting the table and clearing away, as well as washing and drying dishes.

That is, they can—the only trouble is, they won't. Which is just as well, because if they do you wish they didn't.

They mean to, of course. They really want to rake the driveway. In fact, they're abso-

ly dying to rake the driveway. There isn't thing in this world they'd rather do than e the driveway. Why, they'd rather rake t driveway than go to the frozen-custard nd for a triple-dip Martian Special de Luxe. e only trouble is that just this minute y're excruciatingly busy digging a moat in back yard and filling it with water. And en they get through with that, they have to te out ten words for spelling, collect three tty autumn leaves, and find samples of five erent kinds of cloth for homework. Even nother has to understand that homework nes first.

Of course children really enjoy having jobs do. It's just that these particular jobs are t worthy of their enormous capabilities. hat they'd really like to do is paint and paper whole house, take over all the driving, ild an entire roomful of bookshelves, pave whole driveway with concrete all by themves, cook the entire dinner, and repaint the . One row of radishes is too much trouble, t what they'd really like is to plant a half e of corn. Meanwhile they're far too busy d too tired to carry e wastebasket wnstairs for you. You hold a family uncil and you all ree that the chil- en aren't babies y more and that ey're old enough help and to take a real responsi- ity. Everyone de- les on his particu- job and all is rmony and joy.

"I'll do it every y," he says. "Don't u give it another ought. I'll attend it and you won't ve to remind me." Then Monday mes and Monday es, and Tuesday mes and Tuesday es. By Friday you cide it's time to ention it. It's not at you mind leaves the lawn, but u've been cut off om civilization for ree days now. The ailman, milkman, l-truck driver and ocery-store delivery man have decided ot to risk it. This is sensible of them. The cat as been lost for two days too.

The following Monday you mention it gain. "Gee, I'm sorry," he says with feeling. I meant to, but I'll do it right now." Ten inutes later you find him lying on the floor of is room reading (without his eyeglasses and the gathering dusk). Now you have two oices. You can demand that he get up and o it right this minute or you can say to yourelf, "Oh, well. He still has plenty of time to row up." This is by far the wiser of the two ecause if you decide on the first he will stumle around outside for a half hour, unable to nd the leaf rake. When it finally turns up, anging on the hook on the garage wall where has been kept for twelve years, it will be too ark to rake leaves anyway.

Sometimes they can be induced actually to ake a bed by the simple expedient of refusing o feed them any breakfast until they do. This equires enormous will power on the part of he mother as they will now almost certainly e late for school, and if they're late to school who'll suffer? The mother. "That lazy slob of Mrs. Smith," everyone will say. "Wouldn't ou think she could at least get her children to chool on time?" So it all ends up by the nother having to drive the children to school, which is too bad, because the walk to and from chool is about the only fresh air they get and t took longer for the mother than making a couple of beds anyway.

However, she now has to make the beds nyway because she has gone upstairs and taken a look at them. She could leave them the way they are and figure that, as they made them, so they must lie in them, but to tell the truth the children are still growing and their bones are still soft and she fears that if they sleep in those beds it will permanently injure their spines. I mean, bumps and wrinkles are one thing, but when roller skates and books and globes are stirred in with the sheets and blankets ——

If forced to empty an ash tray, they do it all right. Half and half. Half in the trash basket and half on the floor. If the half on the floor is pointed out, they say, "Where? I don't see anything."

My children washed the car once. And they did a fine job of it too. That car really shone. However, unfortunately they had forgotten to close the car windows when they started and when they finished there was still a lot of water left in the hose so they washed the garage too. Then there was still more water so they washed off the whole outside of the house, and it was really an unhappy coincidence that they forgot to close the house windows too.

Character building is very hard on parents. It is often hard on relatives, pets, storekeepers, and so on. The only people it isn't hard on are children.

Here again make use of Rule 1 and Rule 2. Make the beds yourself, empty the wastebaskets, wash the car. And then tell all the neighbors and friends that you can get to listen that your children do it all by themselves. Tell the children they did it all by themselves too. They'll believe it. Let them go around telling everyone they help with all the work. It will make them feel good and build up their egos. And all the other parents and children for miles around will feel awful. It will stir up trouble for years to come.

"Those marvelous Smith children," people will say. "What character! What a joy they are to their parents! They do everything around the house. They do all the snow shoveling, leaf raking, window washing, they papered their own rooms, they always get up early enough to make their own beds and keep their rooms neat—why can't you be like that?"

The school plays such a vital part in the child's development and therefore in the whole future of the country that it is of the utmost importance for parents to understand its function, its aims and methods.

So much criticism has been leveled at the schools in recent years, so many volumes have been written about teaching methods that some parents are bewildered. Are the schools placing too much emphasis on physical education or not enough? Is the discipline too strict or too lax? Are the children spending too much time in school or not enough? Should they learn geography and history or should they have social studies? How is it he's in the seventh grade and still hasn't learned that the principal product of Portugal is cork? Doesn't he know anything except how to dress up in cheesecloth and papier-mâché and be a frog in the school play? Aren't they ever going to teach these children any grammar, for heaven's sake? He doesn't even know what a semicolon is for. (What is a semicolon for? I feel I must have known at one time.)

The modern school educates the whole child. (Some of us old folks never had this advantage, and as a result—see this mark on my ankle?) The school provides gyms and outdoor playgrounds for the development of co-ordination through gross motor activity, as well as teaching the child to integrate himself into team activities. A good school provides music and art where the child, when tired of being integrated into teams, can fully express himself as an individual with a qualified psychologist always on the alert to help interpret these and make sure he isn't getting too individual.

Experiences in social living notwithstanding, the teachers are still pounding arithmetic and spelling into unwilling heads, the children are still learning about the Hessians on Christmas Eve, and they still learn to sing Funiculi Funicula in three parts.

All this educational theory and all this controversy, however, overlooks the one main, vital function of the school, which is really to get the kids out of the house from nine to three. I cannot understand why so many parents have failed to realize this. They go around complaining about this and complaining about that, and meanwhile the thought has never struck them—where would they be without the school? When would they get the beds made? When would they get the marketing done? When would they sit down in peace and quiet to tear their hair out? When, in fact, could they hold their P.T.A. meetings?

Now are you going to object when they talk of raising the school tax? You see? You just didn't think it through before.

In order that the school and the parents may work together to do an optimum job on the children, many schools have a Parent-Teacher Association which provides a place where mothers who have finished making their beds may go to have a cup of coffee and arrange meetings at other times where mothers may go to have a cup of coffee, at which they can decide which mothers will have the job of telephoning the other mothers to let them know when the next meeting will be held at which they may go to have a cup of coffee and elect new mothers to —— Often, out of all this furious activity come new curtains for the school library, which is important, as that is the room in which the meetings are held.

Sometimes the Parent-Teacher Association holds meetings at which speakers are engaged to educate the parents to the use of phrases like "age levels," "gross motor control," "sibling rivalry," "basic insecurity," "parent resentment," and the like. The necessity for understanding these terms is self-evident. Without them, the parents could not intelligently participate in the P.T.A. meetings.

In my own case, for example, it is extremely helpful that I have learned to say "gross motor control" because that is what my children (due to very poor heredity on their mother's side) haven't got. Otherwise I might go around saying, "They're good at reading, but they are lousy at baseball," and this would in no way improve their baseball. On the other hand, saying they have poor gross motor control hasn't improved their baseball either. However, as it has improved their mother's speech it is probably all worth while.

In connection with the important part played by parents in helping the schools, it is worth while to note that many of these interested, sincere, helpful parents accomplish a great deal by reading books on reading, whereupon they may storm these meetings demanding to know why their children are not being taught phonics, or, in some cases, demanding to know why their children are being taught phonics. This confuses the principal and the teachers who have been doggedly trying to please everybody by teaching both phonics and sight reading. Meanwhile the children, unaware of the storm raging in the library, are plugging away at "Cat—c,u,t ? c,i,t ? c,o,t ? c,y,t ? c,e,t ?" By a process of elimination they may arrive at c,a,t, and can start on k,i,t,t,e,n,s, which are sure to follow.

If you have now decided that you are willing to give up certain small amenities (like sleep and money) and go on with raising children there are, along with the hazards, certain joys not found in raising hamsters, cats, and so on.

Children around the house are a constant reminder of your own great and unexpected good luck in having finally, yourself, grown up. Daily you will be reminded how really marvelous it is that you no longer have to face the gym teacher or sing Poor Punchinello in three parts, that you no longer have to practice your piano lesson that you don't have to worry that you won't pass your biology test. Nobody yells at you if you forget to brush your teeth. Big brothers and sisters can no longer pick on you and nobody can ever again chase you out of the house to get fresh air. You can frowst around and read as long as you like (having now chased your own children out of the house to get fresh air). You can shoo the children to bed early and stay up as late as you like. You can wear whatever you like, and if you feel like wearing a new dress around the house just because you feel like it, nobody will say no.

Every morning you can watch the children drink their milk or cocoa, and you'll remember how you used to have to, too, and now your lovely, hot strong coffee will taste even better.

Nobody nags you to cut your nails, brush your hair, wear your eyeglasses, wash your hands, go to bed, get up, go on errands, take vitamins, get shots.

You can listen to the children playing outside with the other children in the neighborhood and you can relax. Nobody is going to torment you any more because you're too fat or too thin, too tall or too short, and nobody ever again will make horrid rhymes about your nickname and your physical attributes.

Nobody is ever going to scold you any more if you spill or drop or lose things but you can scold the children. They're children.

Best of all, as you send them forth to play things, with little exhortations about the need for bodily health and vigor and the virtues of exercise, you can realize happily that no one will ever again try to make you play tennis. You can curl up in a soft chair, with your spine all crooked and your chest all caved in and your muscles all limp and just enough oxygen in your blood to sustain life, and your arches comfortably flat, and you can breathe in that nice smoky air and get yourself all full of coal tar and caffeine and tannic acid and read anything you like, even if it's absolutely stuffed with sex, in the dark without your glasses.

If you should ever really need exercise, you can exercise your authority as a parent. "Never mind why," you can say to them, "just because I say so." (After all, if you can't exercise your authority to your children, who are you going to exercise it to? Everything else around here is so democratic, unless you're a policeman you can hardly have any fun at all.) EN

CATCHING COLD? HEADACHE? NEURALGIA? MINOR RHEUMATIC PAIN?

BAYER ASPIRIN MAKES YOU FEEL BETTER FAST!

BAYER®

And it's one thing most people can take any time— WITHOUT STOMACH UPSET!

CATCHING COLD? FEEL BETTER FAST—Winter weather means fun for the whole family. It also means that adults and youngsters alike will be catching more colds. That's why it's important to have both regular size and flavored Children's Size Bayer Aspirin handy—to use at the first sign of a cold. Bayer Aspirin quickly relieves painful cold discomforts and reduces fever. It makes you feel better—fast!

MORNING HEADACHE? FEEL BETTER FAST—A miserable morning headache doesn't have to ruin your whole day. Bayer Aspirin will bring remarkably fast relief! To see one reason why, drop a Bayer Aspirin tablet in a glass of water. What it does in the glass it also does in your stomach. It starts to disintegrate—is actually ready to go to work—instantly, to make you feel better fast!

NEURALGIA? FEEL BETTER FAST—When the pain of neuralgia, neuritis or a backache threatens to interfere with "after hours" fun, take Bayer Aspirin right away. You can be sure that Bayer Aspirin will bring you the fast relief you want, and the safe relief you need!

Don't Pay Twice The Price Of Bayer Aspirin For ASPIRIN "IN DISGUISE"!

What is aspirin "in disguise"?...a pain relieving product that attempts to belittle straight aspirin yet combines aspirin with such non-pain relievers as aluminum compounds, magnesium carbonate, or baking soda—and it costs you twice the price of Bayer Aspirin!

Why pay more for extra ingredients that can't relieve pain? Instead, get Bayer Aspirin. It's all pain reliever—100%—and medical science has never discovered a safer and more effective pain relieving agent!

MINOR RHEUMATIC PAIN? FEEL BETTER FAST—Countless persons who suffer from rheumatism, arthritis or sciatica find that Bayer Aspirin helps them keep active by bringing quick, temporary relief from minor pains. And Bayer Aspirin is not only amazingly fast, but wonderfully gentle, too—so gentle, doctors prescribe it even for small children.

Washday will never be the same again!

Did you ever!...a detergent that washes and bleaches, all by itself!

First time a detergent ever gave you whiteness like this!

New Oxydol...the only detergent in America that Contains its own Bleach!

(Color-safe Oxygen Bleach)

What a simple, and simply wonderful idea—this new detergent that's changing America's washday, because it's the only leading detergent that contains its own bleach . . . wonderful color-safe Oxygen Bleach.

Only new Oxydol gets clothes detergent-clean . . . bleach-white . . . and helps remove stains as no other suds can . . . all in one simple operation. And for colored washables? Excellent! It's color-safe. Why not let yourself in on this great new idea next washday?

"The Ranch is where my Heart is"

At the Lee ranch in Brownlee, Nebraska:

"Long hours don't seem like drudgery or even like work. It's the difference between loving what you're doing and hating it."

Dear Editors: The series you are now running, How Young America Lives, about the tired overworked young mothers, has started me doing a lot of serious thinking. I think that the confused, tired state many of them are in is due not to overwork so much as the change in values that has come over the United States the last few years.

Younger people are putting too much emphasis on money, things, fun, and whether they are getting their share of it all compared to someone else. Too many comparisons about what we possess and what our neighbors possess can cause a lot of dissatisfaction.

"Overwork" is an easy "out" for girls who are dissatisfied in the first place. I'm enclosing my own story, which could be labeled The Case of the Drudge, or something of the sort; yet I didn't moan unhappily during those years it covers—they were good years, fun even. And they are not over; I am still having fun despite the fact that now I am that other woman the sociologists are worrying over, the one with the "empty nest."

I'll admit I do have one big advantage, although some people would question calling it an advantage—the place where I live, the Sandhills of Nebraska. One famous neighbor of ours called it "God's Own Cow Country"—that is how it struck him after looking over ranch land all over the United States. He was Samuel McKelvie, a former governor of Nebraska. In summer the country is beautifully green, and dotted with so many lakes that from the air one would be more inclined to call it a lake country. It seems to me the people who live here look more at peace with themselves and the world than the hurrying people one sees in cities. Both men and women who live on the ranches here are extremely hard workers, but we aren't just drudges who come in so tired at night that we collapse or vegetate. There are women's clubs, bridge clubs (both husbands and wives), concert series, book clubs; one neighbor plays the piano for hours at night when he comes in from a tough day at ranch work, another does Family gets together when Jackie (married) and Carolyn (working) come to visit and Florence and Dorothy come from college dormitories.

Closest town to the 6300-acre ranch is Brownlee, population 36.

Anyone within 150 miles is a "neighbor." Says Grace: "People are at peace here."

oil painting. I list all that to show that the people are well rounded.

We send our children away to college, but what I want to emphasize is that we work longer hard hours than most city people would stand for. Part of the reason we do it happily is, of course, that we are doing it for the people and things we love, doing it for ourselves; but that brings me right back to the statement that it isn't the work, but the attitude behind it.

I sound like a Chamber of Commerce brochure, or at least one who was raised here and doesn't know anything else and so thinks this is the best, or all there is. That is not so; of all the girls in this community who married ranchers, I was the one least prepared to cope with this life, the one most likely to give up in despair, but I love it all, and wouldn't want to live anywhere else.

I hope you will read what I have written; perhaps it will give you a different slant on young mothers and overwork. I really enjoy your How America Lives series, but I think perhaps it is trending toward fostering self-pity here lately.

Yours truly,

GRACE LEMASTER LEE
Mrs. Forrest S. Lee
Brownlee, Nebraska

P.S. I'm enclosing some stamps—my husband wants this back.

The snow had been falling for five days, Forrest Lee remembers, when Grace threw down her magazine, got out her portable typewriter and started to write. It didn't take twenty-six years' experience as a husband for him to see she was agitated. Normally "she looks about as ferocious as a little kitten," he thinks, with wide blue eyes, blow-away figure—deceptively fragile-seeming in this country of stalwart people. But now her small chin was raised as if against an unseen adversary, her surroundings forgotten in the intensity of her thought. She wrote for two days off and on, while outside the blizzard continued unabated. Forrest hauled hay to the pastures and checked for newborn calves. Otherwise they were detached from normal routine, alone as they are only during a winter storm, with their four daughters away in Lincoln—the oldest married, the others students at the university.

By the time the sun came out she had finished, and her thoughts had gone back more than twenty-five years to a church social in Lincoln. She remembered:

I was an Army brat, an only child. When my father retired we moved to Lincoln, where we lived for six whole years, the longest we had lived anywhere. Around the corner from our house was a small new church. A neighbor girl kept urging me to come to church with her sometime and see the Lee boys. So one day I did, and one of the Lee boys turned out to be the man I married, Forry. We went together two years, were married when he was 21 and I was 19.

Until I met my husband I was like many people: I didn't even know there were ranches in Nebraska. Twice before we were married I visited my husband's parents, but somehow I didn't even notice what was to become a monster in my existence, the separator, that thing that separates the cream from the milk and must be washed every day, and in extremely hot weather twice a day.

I was so well prepared for life on a ranch! Ha! I had had years of private piano and French lessons; my parents must have been preparing me to marry a millionaire. In school I'd taken journalism, trigonometry, analytics and calculus, carefully shunning home economics or anything useful to a future rancher's wife. I had never ironed a shirt; in cooking I fared better—I could make drinkable cocoa and tuna-fish sandwiches (both of which got tiresome after the first three days).

For the first three years we lived with his parents. The first summer (we were married in June, 1931)

"We don't just vegetate. Nobody has time to, or wants to."

Grace is still one of Forry's "best-looking ranch hands in God's own cow country." She remembers start with little furniture, a kerosene lamp, no wallpaper. Since then the land has thrived, machinery has multiplied.

Stock auctions are exciting. Lees also go to dances, a drama club, concerts, sports, rodeos.

Forrest is president of Sandhill Cattlemen's Association, checks news, prices.

Business messages come by phone. Grace brings them—with refreshments.

She cooks for 30 at branding time, when neighbors take turns pooling work.

There were nineteen people at the ranch. I had never seen such mountains of food, dirty dishes and laundry. My in-laws' home was one of the most modern ranch homes around, but by comparison with the city home I was used to—well, it was different. Food was kept not in an icebox, but in an old-fashioned cellar, a long way from the house; we made innumerable trips out and back while getting a meal, and when we were in the cellar there were snakes and spiders to send us out in an awful hurry.

All those people around was something new for me—family and hired help and visitors besides. The phrase "The world is too much with us" went through my mind often that first summer!

Our oldest daughter, Jackie, was born the next July; she was the first baby I had ever held or changed; so here was much more to learn. Then two years later life on a ranch really began in earnest. All the while we had been married, we dreamed of a day when we could have a house of our own, and Forry could ranch on his own, and at last, in May, 1934, we had our chance; we leased a small neighboring place and May first we moved, along with our pitifully few possessions. We were so glad to have our own place, and we knew it meant lots of hard work, but despite the grueling work, we were happy. Being happy in what you are doing makes things seem easier than if you are hating every minute of it.

First grandchildren have arrived on scene—Lorraine, 1, has a brother Larry, 3.

Each night for 20 years Grace has kept up a diary of family history.

Girls grew up in 4-H work, trained own horses, are expert riders. Once a year family takes 3 A.M. starlight ride, canters in at dawn.

Since they were little, Lee girls have owned cattle on shares with father; it helped finance education.

"Our girls helped pay their way through college."

Taped to the glass of the Lees' dining-room cupboard is a cartoon showing a mother and father attending their son's college commencement in rags and patches and saying, "You'll never know how happy this day has made us, son!" It's a joke, of course. But when Florence came home and saw it, "she was stricken with remorse," Grace says. "I told her not to let it bother her, I put it up because we thought it was funny. I don't know that a college education costs too much. Anything worth while costs something."

Nevertheless, by the end of this school year Grace and Forrest will have spent almost $17 000 on their daughters' college educations—about $1500 per girl per year. When the Lees met Chancellor Clifford Hardin last year, he told them, "Anyone sending four girls through school deserves a piece of the university." (Forrest rejoined, "Make it on the fifty-yard line!" and at Nebraska home-coming the chancellor did just that.)

The Lees' expenses have not been out of line with the national average. Surveys show a student attending the university in his home state spends about $800 a year for tuition, room and board, and by the time he also pays for books, laundry, clothing, travel, recreation and personal expenses, he's usually well up around the $1500 bracket. Other schools cost more, depending on the student and the area: four years at a technological school like Stevens Institute of Technology costs about $7600; a private men's college, $8000; and a private women's college, $9000.

Each of the Lee girls has contributed about $350 a year toward her education, money she earns working on the ranch in summers and from fall sales of cattle which the girls own on shares with their father. The girls could have gone to college on less, but Grace and Forrest wanted them to have enough "so they wouldn't have to worry about money and could go to college full time."

Forrest and Grace saved for college the best way a rancher can—by putting aside cattle: "We built it up a few head at a time so that when the college expenses came along we had an income that would take care of them."

(A friend of theirs in a family of eleven children did it another way: "As each child finished high school he taught a year. It helped relieve the financial strain and gave the child some savings to start off college with. And he had a year to work and think over what he wanted to do with his life.")

Most parents feel as Grace does, that college "is more important than it used to be, both in job competition and in producing a broader, more unbiased viewpoint of the world." But that doesn't make it easier to pay for, especially with the cost of a college education almost doubled since 1940—up 8 per cent just since 1954. With expanding enrollments, from a present all-time high of 3,000,000 students to an expected 6,000,000 by 1970, new facilities will be needed, which in turn may force further fee increases.

Most families find it increasingly hard to finance college educations out of current income—especially with several children close together in age. This year an estimated 100,000 high-school seniors who have the ability and want to go on to college will be unable to because of money problems.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 191 That first day on our own, I felt like sitting down and having hysterics, but there wasn't time. The house was four rooms and a "path" (the toilet was a little building north of the house). Some of the wallpaper wasn't bad, but most of it was loose, some completely gone. We patched up what we could and let it go at that; this was the depression and new wallpaper was a luxury we could not afford. For lights we had one kerosene lamp and a lantern. For water, we felt luckier than most people, for we had a pitcher pump right in the kitchen! I'm no Pollyanna, but that pump in the kitchen made me feel glad, glad, glad that I didn't have to go outside to pump water; one neighbor had a pump about fifty feet from the house, down a hill. It wouldn't have been quite so bad if it was up the hill, but as it was she carried the empty bucket down the hill and the full bucket up the hill. All parts of the West claim the phrase that ranch life is wonderful for the men but hell on women and horses, but I'm sure it really must have originated right here in the Brownlee country, in a place where a well would be put down the hill from the house!

The inside of the house wasn't all that was discouraging; outside we were surrounded with broken-down fence, tumbleweeds and sand, sand, sand. The place had been so overgrazed during several dry years. And there was only one tree! Did you ever stop to think how wonderful trees and grass are? I'd always taken them for granted until we moved here. One of Forry's big jobs every spring that we have lived here is to plant more trees, thousands of them, trees around the house and groves that would in ten or twenty years be protection for the cattle during winter storms. Those first few years were so dry, and we were so afraid the trees wouldn't grow, so we planted dozens in the yard. Forry dug holes and planted, I pumped and carried water, then he pumped and carried water. They grew beautifully, and one day not long ago we counted the ones in the yard and there were 125! A far cry from one lone tree!

That first summer we were so poor, and for many years after, but especially so that first summer. In the fall CONTINUED ON PAGE 194

we sold some hay so I became so extravagant as to buy some paper shades for the windows—then even some curtains for two rooms. And we made one very expensive purchase, ■ gas-motored washing machine. Before that I had washed everything by hand, even sheets and overalls. By then we were expecting our second daughter, Carolyn.

It seems to me now that everything contrived to make things as difficult as possible for us to live. Our poor little house was so hot in summer—understandable, since we had to do all our cooking on a coal-wood stove. On hottest days we let the fire go out as soon as a meal was over, but this stove was our only way to heat food or water—water which first had to be pumped, then heated, then every drop carried outdoors afterward. We built up ■ fire in the stove to heat our old-fashioned irons too. Then when winter came we discovered that we couldn't keep the house warm, so we closed off the three other rooms and lived in the kitchen, except at night when we made a brave dash to the bedroom and under piles of covers.

Things got better after many years. In 1938 we acquired a kerosene-burning refrigerator. I was practically delirious with joy. Before that we had an old-fashioned icebox, but always, before the summer was over, the ice supply all the neighbors had put up the winter before gave out, and we kept milk, cream and butter in jars in a stock-watering tank; it didn't keep well—besides, it acquired ■ mossy taste. I was so glad to have a real refrigerator at that time because our fourth daughter was a bottle baby and I was having a time with her food. It was when our third daughter was ■ year old that we got electricity in the form of a secondhand 32-volt plant that worked most of the time, being perfectly wonderful when it did. This meant that at last we could have an electric washing machine instead of the temperamental gas-motored one.

We lived here three whole years without a radio; when we finally got one it provided such marvelous entertainment; before that we depended on reading for our main diversion. We usually went the six miles after our mail one night a week; that was our big night out, and after getting the mail we would often visit Forry's older brother and his wife and play bridge. Our other day out was to go to Brownlee to church on Sunday, except when the roads were too bad in winter.

I haven't said much about roads. We are long distances from anyplace: three miles to our one-room school, four miles to the nearest neighbor, six miles to the post office, thirty-two miles to the high school and forty-seven miles to the doctor and dentist. At first this was all trail, but at long last, about 1946, an oiled highway came through just five and a half miles from us, another big day in our lives and way of living. There are still many miles we travel on the trail roads; in dry periods we get stuck in the sand, when it's wet in mud, and in winter in snowdrifts or maybe we don't go anywhere at all for weeks at a time because of snow.

Roads bring me to the subject of school. Our four girls all went to a little one-room country grade school. Sometimes we had a hard time getting them there too—Forry took Jackie on horseback often that first year. In August before Jackie started her second year of school we had quite ■ shock when a school-board member brought the newly hired teacher to see us and announced it was our turn to keep the teacher that year. I thought wildly, Where? There we were, Forry and I and four small girls, and only two bedrooms! But it was our turn, so we pushed things aside in closets and under beds and took her in. Margaret turned out to be ■ wonderful person and ■ wonderful teacher, and a few years later she was part of the family when she married Forry's older brother.

Then cattle prices looked better for the first time in years, so we added two rooms to the house. A carpenter helped part of the time, but a lot of it we did ourselves; we were do-it-yourself people out of necessity long before it became the thing to do.

In 1945 came the most marvelous thing yet, a windmill and reservoir on the hill back of the house, and water piped down into the kitchen! No more pumping water; I used to tell myself that water pumping was good for me, that pull on my stomach muscles probably kept me from gaining too much weight, but how wonderful it was not to have to pump forty-five three-and-a-half-gallon buckets on washday!

In 1948 came—glory be!—another bit of remodeling, so that we had a bathroom and a hot-water heater; we had been hoping for this improvement for a long time, but postponed it once in order to move in another small house so that we could employ a married hired man. Also about the same time as this the town of Thedford acquired a locker plant where we could store fresh meat, and have it sent over once or twice a week with the mail. This changed our eating and working habits considerably for the better. Before that we had canned hundreds and hundreds of quarts of meat for use when the weather was not cold enough to keep it safely. It used to make me feel so depressed to see all those lovely steaks and roasts being cut up into chunks to can, to be eaten later in a form that was far from the luscious food they were meant to be.

The last big improvement came two years ago when we remodeled the leaky old porch into a utility room, and, best of all, the REA power line came through; now our style of living really forged ahead with all the wonderful appliances that we had wished for so long. I'm afraid my family is already tired of my raving about the washer and dryer, but after the way I washed so many years, and dried clothes in the house on winter days, I think a little raving on my part is excusable.

I haven't mentioned illness; we have had our share of that too. This is a violent country; there are so many accidents that I finally learned to keep a suitcase packed with the necessary things to stay all night, so that if a sudden emergency arose I could grab it and jump in the car and tear off to a neighbor's or to town. We naturally had our share of childhood diseases, and one of the girls had a chronic kidney ailment that sent her temperature up frighteningly innumerable times. Then there are the accidents: a stick of wood in my husband's eyes, splinters of steel another time, a broken foot bone, broken shoulder blade, three appendectomies, two broken noses—all this just in our own family; besides that were the sick and injured hired men we've rushed to the hospital, the neighbors' wives about to have a baby any minute, and assorted smaller calamities that we had to use our own judgment to deal with.

All I have written makes me sound like a pioneer, and I am certainly not; my husband's parents were the ones who had it tough, and their parents before them. They had even less to work with, and Indians besides. There was one time when my husband's mother didn't get off the ranch for eighteen months; the things that she and Dad Lee went through were really something. But they raised a wonderful family, seven children (another little girl died of appendicitis because they couldn't get her to the doctor in time).

We didn't have what you would call a vacation for years, but it didn't seem to damage us too greatly. We all worked like slaves, but we didn't feel enslaved. Even though everything was done the hard way for so many years, happiness and security were a part of our lives. No one gave up and got a divorce; no one started seeing the psychiatrist. There was one period of three years when I did not go to a store to try on a dress; I was practically beside myself when I finally did. My mother-in-law warned me not to buy the first one I saw, but that is just what I did. It didn't fit very well, wasn't especially becoming, but I guess I must have thought I'd better buy it before someone snatched it away!

Perhaps one explanation of why happiness is so much a part of our lives is that we do things together. In this country the father doesn't go off to a job unfamiliar to the children; as soon as they are big enough, they are following him about whenever they can. He is home for most meals; if he goes branding or to some other job at a neighbor's, his whole family quite often goes, too, making a social occasion of it. Ranching is a growing, looking-forward sort of business. We plant trees and watch them grow into beauty and usefulness. We baby along a sick or motherless calf and see it grow into a healthy steer for some farmer's feed lot. When our girls are home through the summer, they break their own horses and are as happy at what the horses learn as a mother is watching her child learn. So it is a business of planning and hope.

According to present-day educators, my daughters were underprivileged as far as schools were concerned. Their first eight years were in a one-room country school with no lights, no bathroom, very little to work with, often taught by a seventeen-year-old just out of high school. For high school we sent them to a Catholic boarding school 150 miles from home. It was either do this or establish another home in a town that had a high school, or send them in to board with someone. We think we picked the best choice, although we were freely criticized for sending them to a Catholic school when we are Protestants. But they had wonderful teachers and acquired a good set of moral and religious values. Living away from home, taking care of their clothes, catching the bus for weekends home, all this made them more self-reliant, more ready for the next big step in their lives, university in Lincoln.

Jackie attended the university a year and a half, married a young law student who is about through school now; they have a three-year-old boy and a baby girl, and Jackie is not a young mother in a dither; she manages beautifully, and is grateful for what laborsaving things she has now, but is not eating her heart out over the ones she does not have—she remembers too well how we used to do things at home. Carolyn graduated last year, Florence finishes this June and Dotty is a sophomore.

HOW AMERICA LIVES in the April JOURNAL

Being a rancher's wife has been the source of a lot of amusement for me sometimes, in the attitude other people take toward us as the years pass and the scene changes. For a long time during the '30's we were lumped off as "country people," poor, without much knowledge. Sometimes the condescension with which we were treated was not easy to take. Then came the "rich rancher" articles, as I call them. Some of the magazines over the nation had articles emphasizing how rich some ranchers had become during the zoom of cattle prices after the war. It's true some ranchers had become wealthy, and maybe a few did drive 300 or 600 miles to buy diamonds and Cadillacs, as one article said (but it wasn't any of the ranchers I knew), but most of us read the articles with a smile and a feeling of chagrin, and used our extra money to pay off debts that had been piling up for years, bought a few things to make our lives a little easier, and "got set" for the next slump in prices which we all knew was bound to come and which has been on us, until recently, for these last three years. Ranchers have long been known as a group of rugged individualists who don't want government interference or help, so when prices drop we aren't looking for or asking for government aid—we are just looking hopefully ahead for the next zoom to pull us out of the hole once more.

One funny thing during the "rich rancher" period was the effect on salesmen and clerks when they saw our personal checks with our brand in the corner; they [illegible] bowed and scraped with politeness and [illegible]ed to sell us more, while we tried to suppress a smile. And people started telling us how much they envied us living on a ranch, and how they would like to retire (ha) someday to a ranch.

We do have two big worries: prairie fires and blizzards—life in the Sandhills is rugged but it is never dull. My French has long been nearly forgotten, and I sold the piano to a sister-in-law to make room for the desk and filing case with typewriter and adding machine which were demanding far more of my time than music. (Bookkeeping is another subject that would be useful to a rancher's wife.) But not for anything would I have wanted to miss any of the lucky breaks that brought me here, to this lovely terrifying country and good people. So all this is life on a ranch and it is good.

Now, the Lee ranch is surrounded by land that is green most of the year—careful cultivation has brought most of the sandy blowouts under grassy root cover. Cattle graze peacefully over their 6300 acres and the house is cool in the summer (with the new air-conditioning unit) and insulated against winter weather that sometimes drops to 40° below zero.

Grace and Forrest have time to go places together, talk together, be together—she marvels sometimes, not having thought about it much before, that "we were married twenty-three years before we were ever really alone."

They manage to see at least one University of Nebraska football game each fall. They go to dancing parties, square and round, in Valentine and Thedford; meet with a group that gives occasional one-act plays, and attend a Bible-study group that meets at various neighbors' to take up the Bible's meaning book by book. In the summer they go to rodeos (Forrest once won the Brownlee calf-roping and tying contest with a time of seventeen seconds).

Since Forrest was elected president of the Sandhills Cattlemen's Association last year they have had some trips farther away, to Denver, Salt Lake City, Fort Worth and once a side trip to Mexico. ("I saw a bullfight!" Grace reports. "I thought I'd be terrified. But they could hardly drag me away. It was fascinating, so dramatic.")

For the past four years they have been buying the ranch, after years of renting it from an owner who sentimentally refused to part with land he had homesteaded. When he died his heirs sold and now they are paying off a $50,000 mortgage on it. With the house, tractors, jeep, horses, 950 head of white-faced Herefords and the land, they figure their ranch investment at about $300,000. They calculate ranch investment as their savings—"if we ever wanted the money we'd have it right here."

Grace keeps the books and Forrest says she knows every detail a lot better than he does. She thinks of good ideas "that I never would" like mapping the pastures to keep track of grazing. They do as many things as possible together. When cattle are driven over the hills in the fall to loading stations, Grace is off after them in the jeep, bringing sandwiches and hot coffee. During spring calving season they sometimes don't get their clothes off all night when a dozen or so calves are born between midnight and dawn.

To Grace each of her daughters is different from the others and she has sometimes thought of them as her "Little Women" although "it isn't exactly accurate, they're so much more tomboys than anything Louisa May Alcott would have imagined."

But the comparison is inevitable. Jackie, tiny as her mother with great dark-lashed eyes and a calm Nefertitilike gaze that can switch in an instant to wistful appeal, was always the most interested in the home and the best cook. It seemed natural when she, like Meg in the story, wanted to get married and have her own family earlier than the others. She also knows her own mind, always. They remember when she came home and announced she was going to marry Chuck. "But you're too young!" they protested, which Jackie countered with the inevitable last line, "I'm older than mother was. And Chuck's older than daddy was." ("She's just like me!" Forrest shakes his head, recalling her rocklike firmness. "Yes," Grace agrees, "she is.")

They all use this ALKALIZING LAXATIVE that gives MORE COMPLETE RELIEF!

The big difference in Phillips' Milk of Magnesia is that it's an alkalizer as well as an ideal laxative! This means that in addition to giving wonderfully gentle and effective relief from irregularity, Phillips' also eases away the acid indigestion that usually accompanies it. Thus, Phillips' gives you better, much more complete relief than any single-purpose preparation.

What's more, two to four tablespoonfuls taken at bedtime work leisurely—without embarrassing urgency. So, when morning comes, you start the day feeling fine. Get Phillips' Milk of Magnesia—the best laxative money can buy.

By MUNRO LEAF

A Get-Up Grumbler is a nuisance to have in any home. They act as though somebody else is to blame every time a new day starts. They lie in bed until they are so late they don't have enough time to eat breakfast the way they should, and they make extra work and extra trouble for people who have to live with them. Get-up Grumblers need to learn that being pleasant, cheerful and helpful in the morning is the best way to make friends for all day and every day.

their sun touch through the winter. She wants to be a country schoolteacher after she gets her diploma this June. "So she can keep her horse and ride him to school," Forrest teases the daughter to whom he feels in some ways the closest for her deep interest in ranch life. But he knows her conviction—that of all professions, teaching is the most important; and of all teaching fields, the country schools "need good teachers most."

Florence is the most independent and enjoys most getting off by herself to read and write poetry and stories. Grace thinks, "She should write more. She gets a lot of feeling into whatever she puts down—and she loves the life out here so much I think she could write about it." (Forrest remembers, "When she was only a little tiny girl I'd go out in the night to see about a calf or horse and think I hadn't made a sound. Then I'd hear those little feet pattering after me and Florence would whisper, 'Daddy, can I go with you?'") Sometimes the family worries that she spends too much time by herself. "She's always ironing somebody else's dress or listening to someone else's problems. She should spend more time thinking of herself."

The government is mainly an expensive organization to regulate evildoers and tax those who behave; government does little for fairly respectable people except annoy them.

Carolyn, dark, elfin, with eyes that dance with gaiety, was graduated from the university last June and is the most like her mother. "Florence looks the most like Grace," says Forrest, "but Carolyn is the most like her. She has her sweet disposition and optimistic outlook."

Carolyn went to Denver last September and got a job as assistant to the accountant of the Gaddis Oil and Mining Company. But her heart is still with Hal March, a Valentine boy whose fraternity pin she took last Easter. How serious they are about each other she isn't sure. But she knows "I wanted to get out and do something on my own before I settle down. I need to know I can." And she's pretty sure, "if Hal and I are really in love this won't hurt us."

Eighteen-year-old Dotty is so stunningly pretty and feminine that people stare to see her leap on a horse bareback and light out at a dead gallop, rope in one hand and grabbing onto the horse's mane with the other. Tall and slender almost to emaciation, she is at one moment a shrieking cowgirl—"the best roper I've got," says Forrest—and the next a sultry-eyed sophisticate addicted to make-up and hair-style fads. ("Shopping with Dotty is painful," says Grace. "Nothing ever fits well enough or has enough style. I'm exhausted!")

Dotty's biggest problem is her grades, and the Lees feel this is because she got a poor start with a teacher who did not encourage her to read—a teacher who once said to Jackie, "Read, read, read! That's all you want to do. Don't you have a mind of your own?" But Dotty admits her main trouble is "I don't worry enough at the right time. I think I have plenty of time to finish a paper. Then I put it off and when it has to be in I'm not ready." Her most absorbing interest at school is a clinic for speech-handicapped children in which she started working last year for an education class. She isn't sure what she wants to do eventually except "I'd want to do something special" and helping children who cannot easily communicate their thoughts might be that: "They're beautiful in their way. They're not defected, they just have one thing they're not so gifted with."

But also, she'd like to travel. "Wherever I live I'd like to be able to come back here. But I want to go different places, too—not just to a different state. I want to go farther than that. I'd go about any place in the world, I'd just like to see what different places are like and how the people are." Someday "of course" she would like to get married. "You think right now you couldn't stand not to be around here riding and breaking horses. But Jackie did it and she's happy—but I'd never want to be permanently any place where I couldn't come back."

All the girls are expert riders and cattle handlers, and since their earliest Four-H Club days, when they raised animals to enter regional stock shows, they have owned their own cattle on shares with their father. After they started in school their earnings helped pay their way, and all plan to retain their cattle interests afterward, as Jackie has.

Last summer was the last, probably, that Carolyn, Florence and Dotty will spend on the ranch together. But they still can get home on special weekends and holidays. Last summer Jackie brought Larry and Lorraine for several weeks. "Don't you think Forry enjoyed having a little boy!" Grace remembers. (Forrest resents this. Never has he implied he isn't happiest to have four girls and he stays gruff for a while after any teasing on this subject. "Which one do you think I'd want to change into a boy?" he asks.)

Nature and its mysteries are one of the Lees' strongest ties, so well understood they seldom discuss it. They only say to each other "Look!" and in silent sharing watch a fiery sunset reflected on a mirror-like pond; hundreds of ducks in perfect formation; a June hillside matted with golden cactus poppies and roses; a hidden nest of upland plover; a colt struggling to rise for the first time on birth-soft hoofs. Or sometimes when they are all at home an electrical storm will sweep up with sudden drama over the hills and they turn out the lights and gather around the kitchen table. There they watch as the thunder and lightning roll closer through the night, crash all about them and finally die away in the distance.

They have so many family stories. Grace's bread dough that went sour, so the story goes, early in their marriage when money was scarce. She buried it in the back yard so the waste wouldn't worry Forrest, but it rose in the warm sand; Jackie discovered it and made everybody

'come see the funny plant that's growing here!"

"Remember the time," Dotty asks Carolyn, "we were on our way home from fixing fence and it was so hot we stopped and went swimming? And the whole boys' Four-H Club went riding by!"

They remember all their pets—deer, magpies, dogs, cats. Chico, a little horse that never grew—"Remember how we kids used to take a radio and some books out to the haystack," asks Florence, "and he'd come out and lie right down beside us?" Sweetie, a pet skunk that liked to go away on extended trips. He had been missing for several days when Dotty came running home, a skunk in her arms, calling, "Mother, I've found Sweetie!" and both stopped dumb as the real Sweetie came around the house. There was Hector, the hawk Grace was left to feed after the girls went back to school—she has scars to prove it! And last summer, a great golden eagle with an 85-inch wingspread that the girls caught when it mistakenly swooped down on a millpond; that one didn't stay!

Sometimes the Lees' attachment for animals is a sorrow rather than a joy. They all remember Stubby, Carolyn's Four-H Club steer which was sent ahead for the show and refused to eat until Carolyn arrived—and how "we all cried all the way home from Omaha" when it had to be sold to the butcher, according to Four-H Club rules. They had learned not to let stock animals become pets—but Carolyn still cannot smile about Stubby, and the Lees buy sides of beef from other cattle, not their own. Once an Ohio feeder sent them a butchered carcass of one of their own animals as a present. They had to mix it with other meat so they wouldn't know which was which. "I'd die if I thought it was one of the triplets," Florence said—one of the offspring of their famous cow, acclaimed one in eleven billion after it produced two single calves, a pair of twins and two sets of triplets in five years.

They laugh about strangers' reactions to their life: the cattle feeder who visited them and stayed up talking—as the Lees love to do—until 1 A.M. and then rose with them the next morning at 5. "He told me," Grace relates, "it certainly doesn't take long to stay all night around here!"

Their party line with seven families is "a main source of news. If you don't answer when it rings for someone you might miss something." To resent overhearing—it cannot rightly be called eavesdropping—would be regarded as the coldest, most unfriendly attitude. Thoughts not open to the public are supposed to be communicated by other means. "Sometimes you're so glad everybody's on," Grace says. "A neighbor's little girl swallowed some liniment and we all went to our medical books and gave her advice until we could get her to a doctor."

At least once a summer since they were small the girls have set the alarm for 3 A.M. so they could ride out by starlight to Hackberry Point. There they watch the stars fade and the sun rise, and hunt for arrowheads in an old sandy blowout. Sometimes they come across patches of wild plums and then they come back with loads of the sweet fruit tied in shirts on their saddles, and all plunge into the job of putting up jelly and jam by the quart. That is, if there are not calves to separate, fence to ride, or a herd to drive to new pasture.

So many memories. In a sense they are not of the past only, but a future. They mean that Grace's "nest" will never be empty. Florence explained it when she told her mother she might go away to teach for a while. "There are some things," she said, "we will always have with us—and some things we can never take away. Part of us stays, even when we go." END

GEORGE ELIOT SAYS:

If you could make a pudding with thinking of the batter, getting dinner would be easy.

What greater thing is there for two human souls than to feel that they are joined for life, to strengthen each other in all labor, to minister to each other in all pain, to rest on each other in all sorrow, to be one with each other in silent, unspeakable memories at the moment of the last parting.

HOW THE LEES SPEND THEIR MONEY

A monthly budget is no part of a ranch-life plan. The Lees' money comes in one lump with the fall sale of cattle. Every other year it's a new car. They buy food in great amounts: flour in 100-pound sacks; sides of beef; gallons of honey and jam; canned goods by the case. What money is left is put aside for small expenses that come along during the year, but "everything's on a yearly basis."

From now on less money will be paid out for school and they will make larger payments on their mortgage. Last year prices were up for the first time in three years (although ranch expenses rose too) and Grace and Forrest figured to gross about $11,600. Here's about how their personal spending comes out in a year:

Food	$1,500	Church	250
Clothing (girls buy nearly all their own)	500	Charities	250
Personal-property tax (not including land, cattle, and taxes on ranch equipment which are "business" expenses)	150	Furniture and appliances	200
		Car expenses	600
		Dry cleaning, shoe repair	50
Fuel, light, water	300	Children's school expenses	2,800
Payment on mortgage	500	Club dues	20
Telephone	105	Magazines, newspapers	65
Insurance	1,700	Cigarettes	73
Medical and dental	550	Gifts (to girls, family, in-laws on birthdays and Christmas)	250
Recreation	150	Income taxes	1,600
		Total	$11,613

Fortunately, more help is available than r before in the form of scholarships, dent-loan plans, part-time work and pay-you-go programs. These are sponsored by sinesses, clubs, religious groups, banks and schools themselves. Nearly all colleges w have special staffs to help work out edu-ion plans for worthy students—not neces-ily outstanding ones, but young people who ow an ability and desire to work for good ades and get the most they can out of school. ten these plans combine aid from scholar-ps or loans with self-help, money from me and part-time jobs in plans tailored to students' special needs, qualifications and sires.

Student loans, the newest idea in college ancing, are available now at two thirds of U.S. colleges for students who can show ility to maintain a ssing-or-better ade average. Terms ry, but they are de-ned to make it as sy as possible for a dent to borrow and pay. Some carry no erest at all while the dent is in school, d a few no interest at y time, with plenty time to repay. At arvard, for example, student can get a an of $400 to $600 a ar, with no interest all during the school ars and 3 per cent afterward, and an in-finite repayment period. The University of orth Carolina will lend full tuition each year ter the freshman year at 3 per cent interest nd indefinite repayment time.

("That's fine," says Grace Lee, "but what bout the girl who gets married instead of be-oming a wage earner? She might have a ird time paying off a loan if she were to get arried and have a family before she was rough with her obligations." She also might ve pause to a prospective suitor.)

Chances of getting this financial help are ex-llent—last year in a group of about 300 col-ges to which nearly 40,000 students applied, 3 per cent were successful. Competition is rprisingly light; less than half the loan oney available last year was actually dis-ursed. College administrators push the idea: 6 per cent in a recent survey said they think udents should regard college as an invest-ent well worth borrowing for.

Scholarship money is similarly available in uch greater amounts than is ever used—bout $4,000,000 worth every year that could rovide scholarships for about 20,000 students. his is in addition to the approximately 175,-00 scholarships worth some $55,000,000 that o find suitable recipients. The trouble in both cases apparently is that students do not realize the money is available or that they are quali-fied to apply for it.

Scholarships today are usually awarded on the basis of need, scholastic record and good character, with the emphasis away from the idea of scholarships as "merit badges" for good grades regardless of need. Most schol-arships do go to students in the upper third of their high-school classes, however, even though only about 5 per cent of scholarship programs state outstandingly high grades as a requirement. More than half the programs re-quire proof of need; and roughly a fourth call for general all-around ability, leadership qualities and worth-while extracurricular in-terests. Awards may run from as little as $50 to all expenses for four years.

Students interested in scholarships should start looking into the possibilities two or three years ahead of time. They should file applications with se-lection committees in the fall of their senior year. They should check all these sources: high-school principals and voca-tional counselors, who usually know what is available for their area; local church, professional and vet-erans' groups; labor organizations, civic clubs and large companies which sponsor the bulk of scholarship programs, especially for families affiliated with them; professional societies, if a student has determined his course of study; and the state departments of education, three fourths of which offer some kind of aid to worthy students. Local librarians can help by directing students to books and pamphlets that list latest scholar-ship information.

Students also should write all schools in which they are interested. From them they can find out what is available, not only in schol-arships but in other special arrangements for student employment, work-study plans, loans.

Sometimes investigation will turn up a scholarship that has lain idle for years waiting for a student with very special, even peculiar, qualifications. Being a Boston newsboy inter-ested in engineering, the daughter of a New York cab driver, an indigent waiter from East St. Louis whose parents were born in Sweden, are sometimes the special qualifications. It doesn't happen often and there are better chances of getting the more usual kind of assist-ance—but it's an example of the wide variety of help available nowadays for students with energy and aptitude, who want to go to college and are willing to scour the possibilities.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN SAID

The poor man must walk to get meat for his stomach, the rich man to get a stomach to his meat.

I believe long habits of virtue have a sensible effect on the countenance.

Do good to thy friend to keep him, to thy enemy to gain him.

s this) was condemned by the critics as sec-ndhand in style and second rate in quality, nd no one except perhaps a few friends at the idewalk cafés thought that the silent, intense panіard was anything more than a typical eft Bank would-be artist.

It is possible that the canvas has some of the eflected luster from the subsequent glory of icasso's reign; yet (with the advantages of indsight perhaps) even in this youthful work ve can detect some of the signs of greatness nd recognize those features of his work which, ven though he paints the wildest abstractions, re the hallmarks of genius. The first of these ualities is the brilliant draftsmanship; every rush stroke is definite and sure. The second is he sense of unequivocal directness. This is the vork of a man who is absolutely convinced of vhat he is saying, and says it with fervor and incerity. One feels the sense of urgency in the voman's mission as she shuffles over the muddy road. We know somehow that she is taking the shortest route between two places of hard and unrewarding work. One can al-most feel the bitter wind whipping the black shawl, the heaviness of the baby on her arm, and the clasp of the chapped hands of the child. One can sense the hard struggle to sup-port the family in some desperately bleak room.

In the hands of a lesser artist the struggle would be morose or sentimental. Picasso de-scribes it as the hard rule of the road in the life of a French peasant.

It has been said that artists, whether they want to or not, invariably leave autobiograph-ical notes in whatever they create. Picasso when he painted this was literally nearly starv-ing—sleeping on the bare floors, eating rotten sausages, and burning (art dealers shudder at the story) his own drawings in order not to freeze to death in his makeshift studio.

HEREWARD LESTER COOKE

Unless you talk about it (and who doesn't?)

Other people won't notice your weight changing. It's gradual. But there comes a time when you notice.

"Hmmm," you say. "Let's go on a diet." Good idea, but don't starve yourself; enjoy yourself. Eat delicious Diet Delight Foods instead of those pound-boosters. It works wonders. The reason this works so well is because Diet Delight Foods are low in calories and have no added sugar or salt. Diet Delight packs your favorite fruits, vegetables, juices and dressings. The fruits are most agreeably sweetened with Sucaryl® (cyclamate calcium). You'll find Diet Delight Foods at your food store. If you don't, complain bitterly—to us, if necessary.

We have a FREE 24-page booklet we think you'll like. It's called "How to Diet Delightfully," and is filled with menus and recipes. Drop a card to: Diet Delight, Dept. DL, Richmond-Chase Company, San Jose, California, and we'll send it right off to you.

WE LIKE BEEF— AND CREAM

Three recipes are for beef—two for sweets—all meant for hungry people.

By GRACE LEE

DI PIETRO

Hungry men after a branding session will be treated with my fresh pies.

HOW AMERICA LIVES

Mealtime at our house can mean fourteen hungry ranchers gathered round the table, or just the two of us on winter evenings. Our freezer and frozen-meat locker store our abundant beef supply. Since our shopping sprees are limited, we buy in quantity whenever we can. Then I cook and bake in quantity, stowing away for future use, including all cuts of beef from roasts to ribs. I'm always looking for new ways to cook beef, of which we have an endless store. Short ribs and dressing is a popular main dish.

Short Ribs With Dressing: Cut the meat from the bones and cube 3 pounds of short ribs. Roll the meat and bones in well-seasoned flour. Sprinkle with ½ teaspoon monosodium glutamate. In a skillet, brown quickly in 3 tablespoons shortening or salad oil. Transfer to a 1½-quart casserole. Cover and bake in a moderately hot oven, 375° F., for about 20 minutes. Meanwhile, drain the skillet of any fat. Add 1¾ cups water, ¼ teaspoon salt, a dash of pepper and 3 tablespoons finely diced onion. Heat gently until the onion is tender and the brown from the pan is absorbed into the stock. Pour over the meat in the casserole. Re-cover. Continue baking for another 20 minutes. Toast 3 cups of soft bread crumbs in a moderate oven. Add 1 cup finely chopped celery, 3 tablespoons finely chopped onion, a dash of salt and pepper and 1 teaspoon poultry seasoning. Add 1 beaten egg to ½ cup milk. Pour the milk and egg and ½ cup hot meat stock into the dressing. Toss well. Remove the bones from the casserole and spoon the dressing over the meat. Return the casserole to the oven and bake for 15 or 20 minutes, or until the dressing has browned and the casserole is bubbling. Makes 4 or 5 servings.

Savory pot roast, surrounded by old-fashioned corn-meal dumplings, really satisfies all my hungry men.

Pot Roast With Corn-Meal Dumplings: Flour a 3-to-4-pound pot roast of beef. In a large kettle or Dutch oven, brown the meat well on all sides. Add 1 cup canned tomatoes, 1 cup water and 2 cloves garlic, crushed. Season with 1½ tablespoons salt and ½ teaspoon pepper. Cover and simmer for two hours. Then add 1 cup onion slices. Mix together ¼ cup vinegar, ¼ cup lemon juice, ¼ cup catchup, 2 tablespoons brown sugar, 1 tablespoon Worcestershire sauce, 1 teaspoon prepared mustard and ¼ teaspoon paprika. Pour over meat. Cover and simmer until meat is tender, about 1 to 1½ hours. Remove meat from gravy. To make dumplings, sift together ¾ cup flour, ½ cup corn meal, 1½ teaspoons baking powder and ½ teaspoon salt. Stir in ½ cup milk and 2 tablespoons melted shortening. Stir just until dry ingredients are moistened. Drop by large spoonfuls into hot gravy. Cover. Cook over medium heat for 15 minutes. Do not peek at all during cooking. Makes 6 servings.

Beefsteak pie rates as a hearty meal. I use a biscuit-dough topping on the pie and then bake a batch of biscuits to eat with the delicious gravy.

Beefsteak Pie: Cube 1½ pounds beef chuck and roll in a small amount of flour. Add ¾ teaspoon salt and ⅛ teaspoon pepper. In a skillet sauté the beef quickly in 2 tablespoons fat until golden brown on all sides. Add 1 cup hot water, ½ teaspoon thyme, 1 medium onion, sliced, and ¼ teaspoon basil. Simmer, covered, for 45 minutes. Make a paste of 1 tablespoon flour and 3 tablespoons water. Add to meat broth to thicken. Season with 1 teaspoon Worcestershire sauce, ⅛ teaspoon each nutmeg and season salt, and a dash of monosodium glutamate. Pour into a 1-quart casserole. Top with a pastry or biscuit topping and bake in a hot oven, 400° F., for 25 to 30 minutes, or until the topping is browned. Makes 4 servings.

Since we milk our own cows, our milk and cream supply is more than we can use. Grandpa Lee has helped solve the problem with his banana-oatmeal cookies.

Banana-Oatmeal Cookies: In a large bowl add 1 cup sugar to ¾ cup heavy cream. Beat until light. Add 1 slightly beaten egg, blending well. Stir in 1 cup mashed ripe bananas, 1½ cups instant oats and ½ cup raisins. Sift together 1½ cups flour, ½ teaspoon baking soda and 1 teaspoon salt. Add to cream mixture. Beat well. Drop by teaspoons onto ungreased baking sheets. Bake in a hot oven, 400° F., for about 12 minutes. Remove immediately from baking sheets. Makes 4–5 dozen cookies.

Most ranch wives include sour-cream pie in their baking. Another favorite way to use heavy cream.

Sour-Cream Pie: Add 1 tablespoon lemon juice or vinegar to 1 cup heavy cream. Allow to stand for a few minutes. Mix soured cream with ¾ cup sugar and 2 slightly beaten eggs. Add 1 teaspoon cinnamon, ½ teaspoon nutmeg, ½ teaspoon cloves and a pinch of salt. Mix in ½ cup seedless raisins and 1 teaspoon grated lemon rind. Pour into an 8″ pastry-lined pie plate. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 40 to 45 minutes, until custard is set.

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

can't recall a time when the two of them weren't dieting. But they never diet on weekends, since my mother believes people deserve the pleasure of eating what they want a part of the time.

"Mother pressed a piece of the cake on me. I hated to hurt her feelings. Also, by then I was ravenously hungry.

"I started on the eating binge at my parents' house. When we left there my mother gave me the half of Aunt Ida's cheesecake that hadn't been eaten. After Clark and the boys were in bed, I ate the cake to the last crumb and polished off nearly everything that was edible. I used a quarter of a pound of butter on the four slices of bread. Then I laid my head on the kitchen table and I cried. I was miserably disgusted with myself.

"Finally Clark came into the kitchen and talked me into coming to bed. By then I had washed the dishes, scoured my copper-bottomed pans, scrubbed the linoleum and woodwork and defrosted the refrigerator. We both pretended I hadn't made a pig of myself but had just been in the mood to scrub and clean in the middle of the night.

"Clark professes to be satisfied with our marriage because he has the patience of an angel, but he can't conceal the truth from me. Two years ago, before our youngest was born, Clark had a nervous breakdown and spent six weeks in a naval hospital while the older boys and I stayed with my parents. I'm quite sure my mother and father and I, all three of us, were responsible for his illness. The psychiatrist at the hospital as much as told me so.

"My mother and father, my mother in particular, have never approved of Clark. He and I grew up in the same neighborhood back East and considered ourselves sweethearts from our early teens, something my parents refused to acknowledge for a long while. They had big ambitions for me; mother and father both held jobs in order to provide me with the advantages other kids in our neighborhood lacked. We had a large, nicely furnished apartment, but we lived in a poor section. I wasn't supposed to be friendly with anybody on our street; my parents tried to arrange for filling the hours they were away from home and I wasn't in school with activities that would be of benefit to my future. Except for Clark, I would have had a thin time as a teen-ager. Everybody was crazy about him. I was invited to some of the parties, but only because he and I were going steady.

"I hardly knew how to behave among my contemporaries. I was very shy and terribly afraid of boys. When I was in the fourth or fifth grade a boy tried to kiss me; I told my mother and what she said about the entire male sex frightened me. When I think about that conversation now, it still makes me feel shivery and cold. But when I met Clark I realized here was a boy who respected girls and liked me for myself, not just for my body.

"I wasn't permitted to join most of the clubs, attend the school picnics and dances and such. For a short time, I was allowed to be a Girl Scout. Whenever there was a Saturday-afternoon meeting, my mother would tell me I was the largest girl in the group and the loudest girl, too; that in the hubbub she could always hear me shouting and yelling. I wonder . . . maybe the loudest ones are the loneliest.

"I had piano lessons, violin lessons, private dancing lessons. I didn't distinguish myself at the piano, at the violin or at dancing. I was the first girl in junior high school to be treated to a beauty-shop permanent wave. My hair has always been straight as a stick and the wave didn't take well. I was dressed in prettier, more expensive things than any of my schoolmates, but even in those days I was too fat.

"I began going on diets when I was ten years old. Even so, I was always the tallest, heaviest girl in my class at school. I hated my size, but I hated dieting too. I used to long for the weekends when my parents would be home and the three of us could sit down at a table together like other families. Ordinarily I had to eat by myself, grabbing whatever came to my hand out of the refrigerator. Our weekend meals were regular feasts.

"I was a scholastic disappointment to my parents. I barely made college. When Clark went away to the Navy, my parents sent me to the state university in the hope I would break with him permanently. For several months I wore the fraternity pin of a college man and my mother was in seventh heaven. But then Clark got a furlough and when I saw him again I knew there could never be anybody else for me. I dropped out of college and took a job and Clark's ring. On my parents' account he and I did agree to delay our marriage for six months until his discharge from the Navy.

"I dislike to criticize anybody, especially my own mother. But one day we went shopping for my wedding gown and found a lovely dress priced at forty-five dollars in size twelve. There was a size-fourteen dress, too large for me and less becoming in style, that cost thirty-nine ninety-five. 'Don't buy now,' my mother said. 'In six months you will probably need a size fourteen.' She was quite right! In the six months Clark was waiting for his discharge, I gained twenty pounds and could barely squeeze into a size sixteen.

"I couldn't help blaming my mother for my tight-fitting size-sixteen wedding dress. I half-way convinced myself she had encouraged me to overeat because she disliked Clark. That hurts my conscience now. My parents have yet to spare expense on me and mine. They shower Clark and me with gifts. They buy practically all the boys' clothes; for Easter they bought suits, coats and shoes for all three, although only Andy needed clothing.

"If my parents had not stood by, there would have been many times Clark and I could not have managed financially. When I became pregnant with Andy in the first year of marriage I lost my job, and Clark was by no means solidly established in his work. I was just eighteen and terrified at the mere idea of having a baby.

"Until the nurse put Andy in my arms I had never touched an infant in my life. I was scared to death I might make some terrible mistake. My mother got over being furious at my marriage in her pride at becoming a grandmother. She took complete charge of Andy. Indeed, he stayed in the East with her and my father while Clark and I came West and located a home out here.

"I have good parents, a fine husband and wonderful children. I should consider myself the luckiest girl on earth. Instead I brood and feel wretched, scream at the boys, criticize my mother, snap at Clark and go into a rage and depression if he smiles at another woman. I eat until I can't bear to look in a mirror. Except for Clark's small shaving mirror, there isn't a mirror in our house. Diets and pills haven't done a thing for me. I've read enough on the subject to realize an appetite like mine must have some psychological basis. That's why I came here to ask for your help."

All the ills of democracy can be cured by more democracy. ALFRED E. SMITH

Clark tells his side:

"The disturbing thing is Abby's unhappiness," said slim-hipped, twenty-eight-year-old Clark, a man of medium height; worry lines were carved on his forehead and around his sober gray eyes. "I wish she could understand I love her regardless of whether she is thin as a wand or has gained a little weight. She subjects me to storms of baseless jealousy, but so far I've been able to cope with that. What really gets under my skin is to hear Abby endlessly lament she is as big as a house and then pick on the kids—Andy is her favorite victim—because she has gone off a diet or has gone on one. My wife has a large frame and, in my opinion, can carry some extra poundage. I'd choose a sweet nature in preference to a perfect figure any day.

"Long ago when Abby was a lonely, big-eyed kid, I decided her happiness would be my main objective in life. Ask Abby now and perhaps she may tell you her childhood and her parents were darned near ideal. If so, her memory is in error. There was fun in my family, none in hers. My mother and father and all us kids—we were three boys, two girls—had less money, a smaller, shabbier apartment than Abby's family. But we lived in the present, so to speak. Abby's mother and father, her mother in particular, counted on a fortune in the future. While she attempted to get the fortune, Abby was left alone a lot.

"Some of the others in our high-school crowd thought Abby was high-hat. I knew she was scared. Almost anybody would be scared of my mother-in-law. When she and her sister team up together, believe me, there are few who can hold out against the combination. For years those two women have done the talking and deciding for my father-in-law, who is a nice enough guy but so henpecked he can no longer feel his scars.

"My mother-in-law has good points too. She is extremely generous, but hell-bent to give you what she wants. Last Easter she bought for our three boys clothes Abby definitely didn't want the boys to have. Once in a while Abby would like the opportunity of choosing the suits and coats that please her own taste. Frequently she complains to me that her mother's taste is old-fashioned, but I notice she doesn't complain to her mother. I keep my mouth shut, too, although the truth is I would prefer to clothe my own family.

"On Andy's sixth birthday, his grandmother presented him with an English bicycle that would have been appropriate for a boy of twelve. Andy was not only too young to appreciate the value of the bicycle; it was too dangerous for him to use in a neighborhood as overrun with traffic as ours. Abby wouldn't allow him to ride the bike anywhere except in our handkerchief-size back yard, which was O.K. with me. However, she then nagged at the boy for being clumsy and slow in learning to ride. Andy has grown too fast and is poorly co-ordinated, but Abby's nagging isn't helpful to him.

"The bicycle became such a bone of contention that the boy grew to dislike it. Twice he pushed the bike out in the alley for the trash man to collect, but I managed to recover it without Abby's knowing. But when he left it in a rainstorm she found out and there was a terrible row. Abby squabbles with Andy as though both of them were the same age. Sorry as I feel for him, there isn't much a father can do.

"In my estimation, Abby has impossibly high standards for our oldest son. She raises Cain at Andy's poor grades, his awkwardness, his noisiness. She compares him unfavorably with his younger brothers, objects because he is too shy to make friends his own age. She herself is too shy to call on a neighbor or to visit Andy's school. I wish Abby would realize she is too hard on a seven-year-old. According to our physician, Andy's asthmatic attacks are definitely connected with his emotions.

"I am in a better position to be sympathetic with an emotional ailment than is Abby because of my own experience. The primary reason for my breakdown, although my wife still isn't quite willing to admit it, was my mother-in-law. In the hospital I learned to live and let live where my in-laws were concerned.

"I now can take my mother-in-law's constant carping without too much pain. Neither she nor my father-in-law has ever accepted me as a son. The day after Abby and I were married the two of them and her Aunt Ida drove to the hotel where we were honeymooning. My mother-in-law announced to my bride that she was free to drive home with them right then or to return at any time our marriage wasn't satisfactory. I moved to the West Coast in the hope of putting a continent between Abby and her parents. I made a big mistake when I let Abby talk me into leaving Andy in her mother's care. Instead of our going back for our baby, my in-laws brought Andy to the West, liked the climate and stayed. The climate they liked best was in the neighborhood where Abby and I own a home. They bought a house exactly ten blocks from ours.

"My mother-in-law pops in on inspection tours at least once a day, with the result that Abby has turned into a demon housekeeper. She snatches up the ash tray the minute I lay down my cigarette, yells at our boys for being boys, and races for the dust mop and broom if her mother lifts an eyebrow. Even so, she can't measure up. A couple of weeks ago I walked in from the barbershop to find all three of my boys miserable and Abby tearful and angry. Her mother had been displeased at the state of our curtains and had washed, starched, ironed and rehung the lot. For good measure she had also scrubbed the woodwork in our bathroom, although Abby scrubs it every second day.

"Since Abby is nearly always on some kind of diet and is generally hungry as a bear, she tires and flies off the handle easily. Her mother's peculiar eating habits—my mother-in-law starves all weeks and stuffs only on Saturday and Sunday—keep her mother's weight close to normal. Those same eating habits don't suit Abby, but she is constantly exposed to them. We spend our weekends with my in-laws. All our weekends.

"Despite Abby's shyness, I would enjoy having a few friends. We have no time for friends. For the past six years I've played pinochle with my father-in-law on practically every Saturday and Sunday afternoon—I dislike pinochle—and several hundred times I've watched my mother-in-law look at an overloaded dining table and heard her say, 'Let's be sure and finish off everything and then we can start dieting tomorrow.'

"My mother-in-law invariably cooks enough to supply an army. The uneaten food isn't wasted. It's packed in the car for us to carry home. One Sunday several months ago, as we drove away, Abby began regretting the fact she had accepted a blueberry pie and a big chunk of cake. I pulled up at the curb and set the pie and cake on the sidewalk. Before I reached the end of the block I had to turn the car around, go back and pick up the stuff we didn't want or need. Abby couldn't bear the slight risk of hurting her mother's feelings and she wasn't willing to waste good food. She ate the pie and cake that night.

"Abby and I have been married for eight years. Her parents' influence still surpasses mine. Although Abby hasn't said so, my guess is that she secretly disapproves of sex. Never in any way in eight years has Abby indicated that she wants my love. On the contrary, more than once she has seemed to be shocked if I approached her in the mornings or afternoons. Abby and I haven't discussed the issue, but I'm convinced she believes sex should be confined to the night hours. I don't agree. I'm home in the daytime a good part of the week. I see nothing wrong with love in the sunlight and the morning.

"I don't blame Abby for her beliefs. It's virtually impossible to escape the dominance of a woman like my mother-in-law. By hook or crook she contrives to even the score. Last summer I was determined to manage my two weeks' vacation without suggestions or advice. I packed Abby and the three boys in the car and we took off to Arizona. When we got back we discovered two new orange trees had been planted in our yard in places we didn't want orange trees, that our kitchen had been repainted in a color we didn't like, and that all five of us had been provided with brand-new bedspreads.

"Abby thinks her weight is rough on our marriage, but I consider the weight of her family and our other problems far more important."

The marriage counselor says:

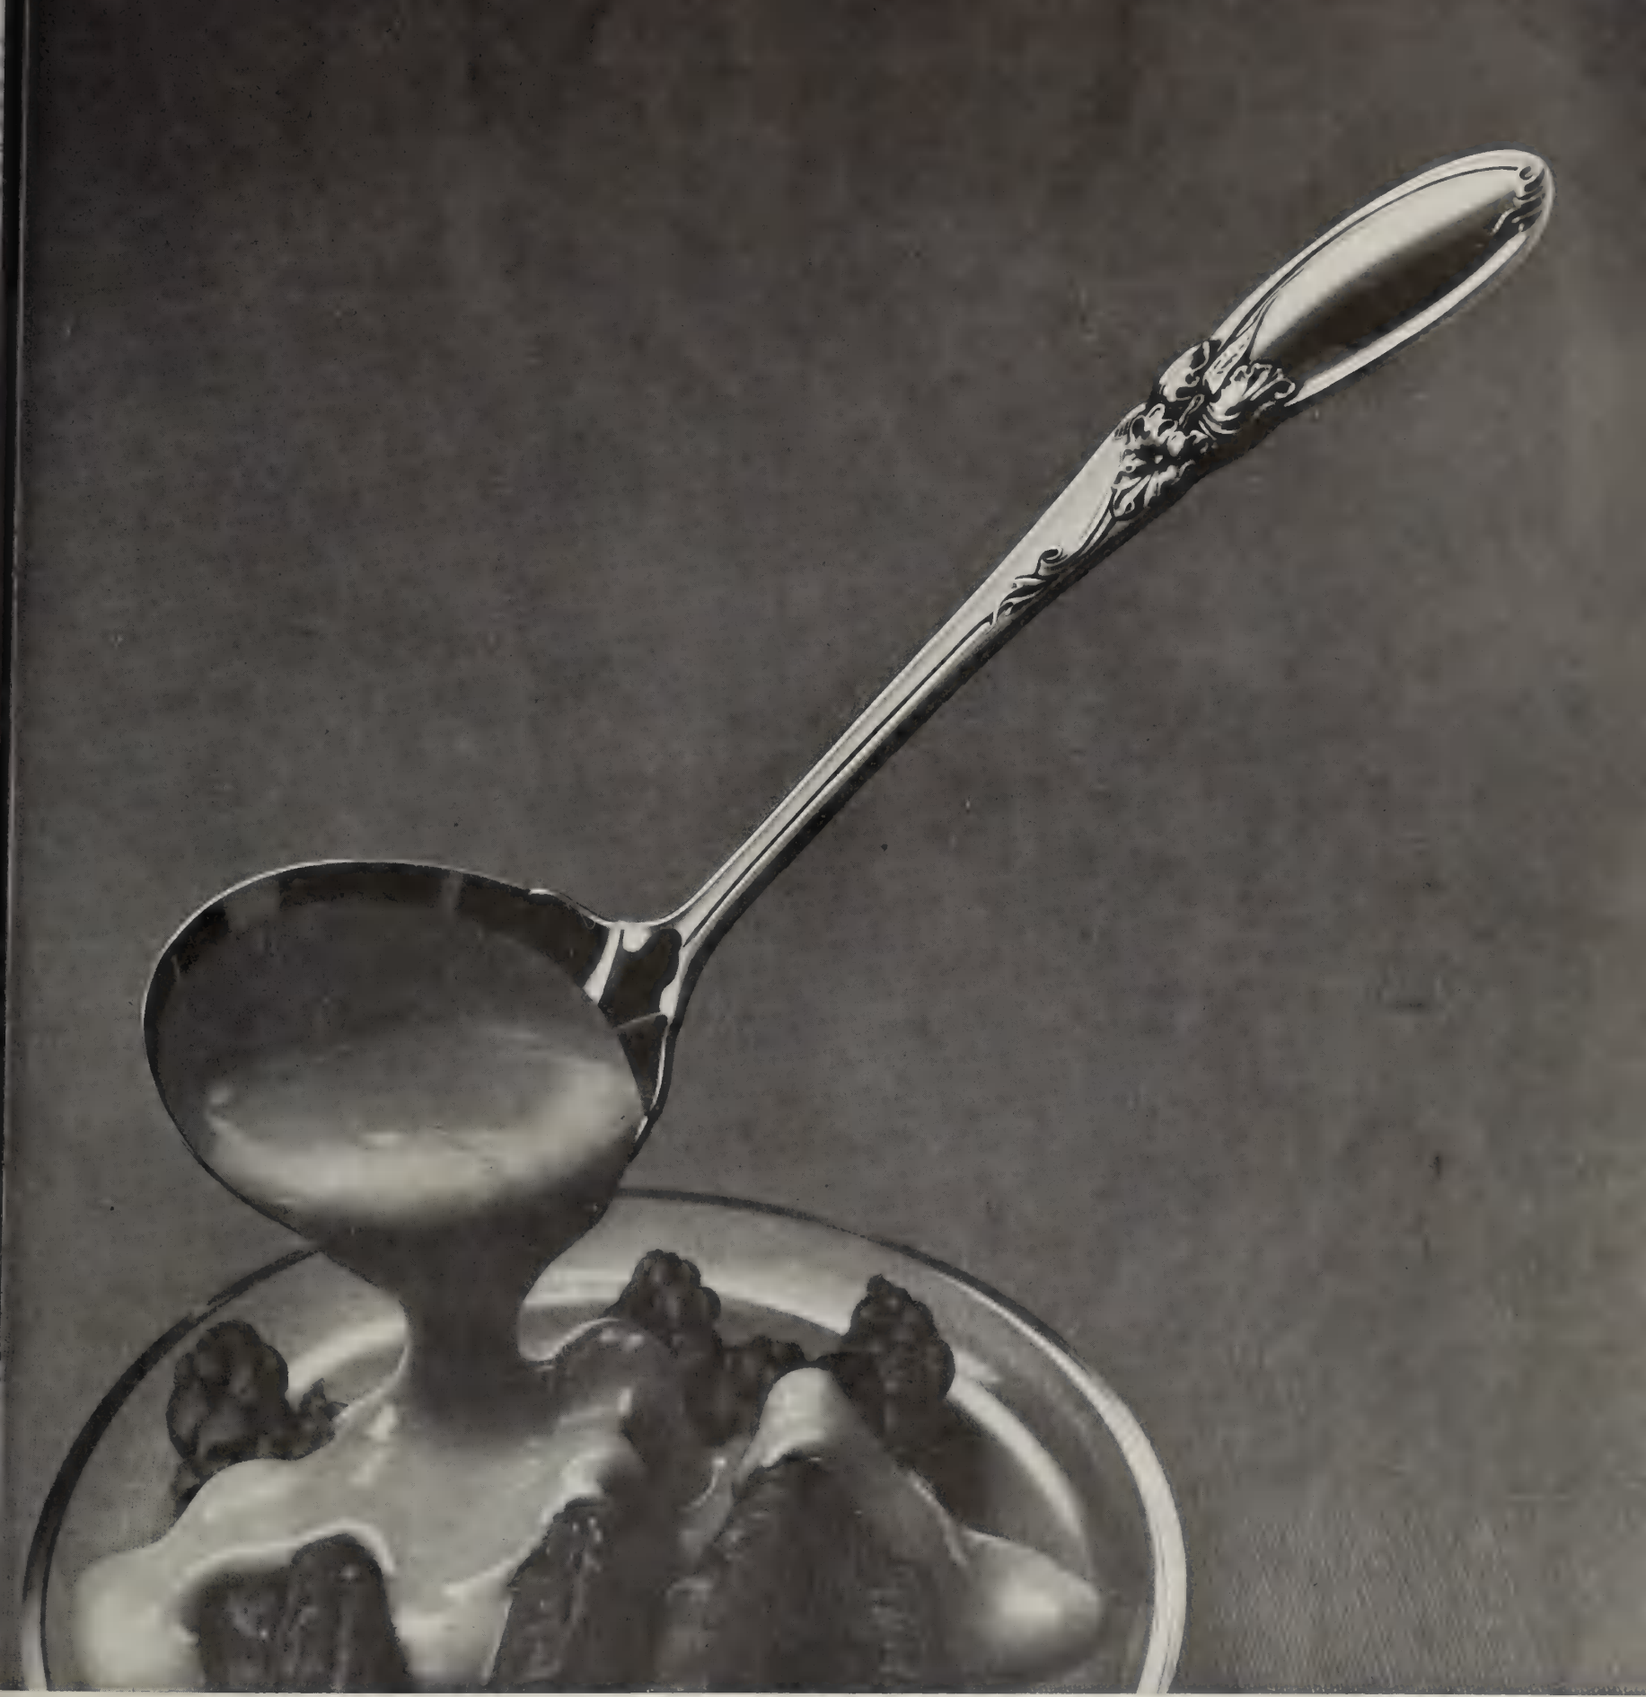
"Abby and Clark were drifting toward trouble of a serious nature. Although Abby's inability to push away from the table had brought her to the Institute, both she and Clark were aware that many other disturbing elements existed in their marriage.

"My first prescription to Abby was the purchase of a full-length mirror, hung in their hall so she would catch sight of herself every time she passed. It was a real effort, but each day she stood before the mirror and studied her reflection from every angle. This practice in facing the facts about her figure was a useful adjunct to our interviews and provided Abby with sufficient incentive to avoid her binges of compulsive eating. Previously she had overeaten whenever she was bored, lonesome, self-pitying, depressed, jealous of Clark and his outside interests, annoyed at her mother, or just battling with small Andy.

"I can't describe exactly the diet Abby elected to follow, since suggesting a suitable diet doesn't fall within my province, but in six months she had dropped to a hundred and fifty-four pounds and was well on the way to the hundred and forty pounds that would be becoming to a young woman of her height and build. Her desire to lose eighty pounds was unrealistic; Abby does bear a marked physical resemblance to Marilyn Monroe, but at a hundred and fifteen my hunch is she would be a rack of bones.

"The early days had laid the foundation of her compulsive eating and emotional problems. As a child, Abby had improper eating habits to imitate. No physician would recommend living on grapefruit and coffee all week—as Abby's mother often does to this day—and then gorging over the weekend.

"In the second place, Abby's father and mother constantly held over her the idea she was superior and must always turn in a superior performance. A girl of average intelligence and unusual good looks, Abby always felt that what she did was not quite good enough. There is no question that her mother and father love her in their own way; she grew up in an atmosphere of parental possessiveness where material possessions were overrated.



"Although Abby was left to herself more than the average child, her parents expected to choose her friends, clothes, activities, reach her decisions for her and certainly pick her husband. At times Abby was subjected to sharp discipline, but most of the time she was coddled and petted; she was not trained to see an enterprise through if she tired of it.

"Since Abby had been taught to believe 'Mother and father know best,' it was hardly to be expected that she could trust her personal choice in a husband. Clark's stubbornness as a suitor was responsible for the union. When Clark failed to win her parents' approval, Abby was incapable of standing up for him. Her way of handling dissension and trouble—in addition to the overeating—was to do and say nothing, just brood.

"Her retreat into the silences was interpreted by her mother and father and her husband as being an admission that she'd made a poor marriage. In this fashion, she reinforced the domination of her parents and gravely lessened Clark's confidence in himself and his judgments. By the time I met Abby and Clark, they were entirely out of communication with each other and unable to discuss this situation.

"Abby needed to teach herself how to stick to a diet and thereby increase her own feeling

There is no compromise with truly fine Silverware

Sooner seek a substitute for hospitality itself than expect "make-do" tableware to match the warmth and sparkle of fine silverplate. For only in silver is it possible to achieve the brilliant design clarity and permanence of beauty that is the hallmark of every Community pattern. This lasting beauty is the very essence of Community quality. Its choice is undeniable evidence of faultless taste. No wonder, then, in today's trend toward elegance, that anything less than Community is inevitably disappointing. The Community* pattern collection is created in the Design Studios of Oneida Ltd. Silversmiths. See it today, at your jeweler's or silverware department, and see how it can bring true beauty into your life.

self-confidence and adequacy. But her paramount need was to acknowledge that Clark and her sons deserved first claim on her loyalty, emotional support and energy.

"Abby struck her first blow for mature independence in an amusingly domestic way. Clark brought home a tentlike canvas contraption to conceal their outdoor clothes reel—transformed a strictly utilitarian object into something that was colorful and gay. His mother-in-law did not admire the new acquisition, stripped it from the clothes reel, took it back to the store and used the refund to buy two lawn chairs to place on her daughter's terrace.

"Abby promptly returned the lawn chairs and came home with Clark's original purchase. Next afternoon when the inevitable pop-in occurred and this flouting of authority was discovered, Abby stood her ground and carried her rebellion still further. When her mother walked in the sink was full of dishes and Abby was helping Andy with his reading. She refused to allow her mother to wash the dishes or to relieve Andy of his reading chore in favor of play.

"Since then—I first saw Abby and Clark many months ago—the couple have changed their living conditions and Abby has changed her appearance—and, more important, her personality—almost beyond recognition. In the somewhat unusual way, I was able to be of practical assistance to Abby and Clark. I believed it almost imperative, for psychological and emotional reasons, that the family move a greater distance from Abby's parents. Their physician believed small Andy's health would be benefited by dry, desert air. Clark had used his GI rights to obtain a mortgage on their first home in California, but the physician and I made a successful appeal to the Veterans Bureau that the loan be refinanced for a different locale.

"Abby and Clark and their three children now live thirty-five miles from her parents; their visiting back and forth has become impractical. Abby's mother and father, originally miffed by the move, are now resigned to the separation. Abby now understands the motivation for much of her irritation with her eldest son. In her mind and emotions, Andy was her mother's child, not hers. To worsen matters, Abby, closely identified with her eldest son, held up to him the same overhigh standards that had confronted her as a child and felt frustrated and a failure whenever Andy failed.

"Andy is a bright youngster. He readily responded to love and praise where he had sullenly withstood criticism and bitterly resented the favoritism Abby showed the younger children. Andy's muscular co-ordination still lags, but he quickly climbed scholastically. As her first conscious effort to end her self-imposed isolation, Abby offered herself as a room mother, a volunteer, part-time assistant to Andy's teacher. The offer was promptly accepted. Naturally Andy was pleased and proud. In this work Abby met other young mothers, neighbors, with similar problems.

"Nowadays Abby and Clark spend perhaps a third of their weekend time with her parents (they no longer carry home rich cakes, puddings, pies); they spend the balance of their weekends with their young friends or pursuing hobbies they now share.

"Clark's working hours are abominable; during the work week he seldom arrives home before midnight. But Abby now understands his need for relaxing before sleep; at her request he wakes her when he comes in. She has a special easy chair in his new hobby room. She sits there in her negligee while Clark files his coins and stamps, and they discuss the events of the day until finally they retire. Abby and Clark's sexual relationship is now on a mutually pleasant basis.

"I don't know Abby's present weight. She is still sensitive on this subject. But the last time I saw her she was so radiant with happiness that I doubt if anybody's eyes could leave her glowing face long enough to study the dimensions of her waistline."

SPRING

By KAY BOYLE

You see these halted days of March as a fixed season,
See as immutable nights with rain on the panes, when cats cry out for love.

But listen, listen: each man is a country, with both north and south, loyalty, treason, Passion and its repudiation, in him; the birds of his forests, hawk as well as dove.

He is in conflict as a country is,
his opposed climates
California, Texas, Maine (Varied as you who look past me with glacial eyes, or else turn March to April when you speak my name).

Long arctic midnights of the heart are ours, my love, and noondays when the mind
swoons in the sun;
Our throats both parched for speech and liquid with eloquence, like canyons in which Colorado torrents run.
Crossing this desert, the bleak eye perceives man is both wilderness and cultivated land.
(In the stone soil of transient winter, roots move like the opening fingers of a dreamer's hand.)

Have you forgotten how soft the footstep falls on moss, how the daffodil
Unfurls like a trumpet's golden call; that lilacs, blue as the gaze of stars,
Burn in spring's firmament:
that the slow, sweet yielding of the iron will
To the other's will is ecstasy longer than the Milky Way, sharper than Mars?
(Have you outstared the faded eyes of man's despair too long in the glass
To remember the willows' straight green hair and the taste of onion grass?)

Now is the time for the old month to be unbuckled like a cape
And slipped from your shoulders; time for your lips to shape
My name as mine shape yours in the spring night; for your voice to say
The syllables gently, steadily, like the softly falling rain (Quiet as you who turn toward me and do not breathe, evoking May in April when you speak my name).

h a magnificent set of teeth, so fierce-look- that they had earned for him the nickname 'Puli manushan," or tiger man.

Anathan, on the other hand, kept pretty ch to himself. If Tirumbala had let him, he ght have taken up permanent residence ler the kitchen table; for the domain of pot l pan was the one place in his rather cir- nscribed world where, teeth or no teeth, he s free to act and think as he pleased—his of privately iniquitous reverie, as it were. course when he did speak, it was with con- erable difficulty and much to the amuse- nt of his fellow servants who laughed at him ause he was so disgustingly henpecked. usini suntheli," they called him, meaning he kitchen mouse."

What was cause for amusement among the vants, however, aroused only the most in- se scorn and anger in Mr. Prutter. More n once he had been frustrated to the point tears by the cook's dreary meekness. For- nately for Anathan, Meigudy was relatively removed from everything. There were no oks available among the local population, d until one could be trained or discovered, nathan was a necessity. If it had not been so, doubtedly Mr. Prutter would have dis- ssed him on the spot despite Mrs. Prutter's rsistent but subdued objections.

Nevertheless, the whole business remained veritable thorn in Mr. Prutter's side, a living minder, so to say, of his own ineffectuality en it came to making evangelical headway th the outcasts who turned a somewhat in- ferent shoulder on the word of God. In the ce of this it was a consid- able strain on Mr. Prutter keep a close check on his mper. Up until today he d done a decent job of it. nly this noon, after An- han had scorched the ilk and served smoky od, Mr. Prutter at last oke down and openly iced his opinion.

He did so with more than stomary vigor. "Blast it!" he roared. "It's gh time we got rid of the blithering idiot!" s if by magic, the pronouncement was trans- ted into a thousand Tamil variations, all ually awesome, and word passed around e compound that the cook was on the way ut.

It was foolhardy now for Anathan to sup- pse that Tirumbala did not know, or that he would not be waiting for him. Resignedly e reached up and unscrewed the light bulb ver the kitchen table. Then taking his lantern nd matches, he went out onto the veranda, here he stood in darkness trying to compose imself and prepare for the inevitable on- aught.

n this perturbed state of mind, he was only alf conscious of the light that blinked on in an pstairs window of the bungalow. Since no ne could truthfully call him a nosy man—not ven under the most intriguing circumstance— he fact that he noticed this light at all was ore the result of chance than curiosity. At ny rate, for no good reason he looked up. here in the window, clearly silhouetted gainst the light, he saw Prutter dorai open his outh and furtively remove his teeth—all of em. These he placed in a tumbler of water n the window sill, and then, just as suddenly s the light had appeared, it went out, and nathan was left transfixed with fear and as- onishment in darkness.

At first he was not sure whether to fly or to rostrate himself. Never before in his life had e heard of anyone capable of removing teeth ithout pain or loss of blood. The idea, hough fascinating because it left room for peculation, was utterly preposterous, incon- eivable. A man simply could not do that to imself, any more than he could pull out his ongue or eyeballs or what-have-you. And et he himself had seen . . . or had he? It was ll so swift, so unexpected, and darkness, hav- ng removed the only means of verification, eft room for doubt.

"Yen achariyam!" Anathan muttered. "What wonder, this! Surely the night air has touched my head and I am now entering the first stages of insanity where I begin to see things!"

His first impulse was to bolt. He did not bother to light his lantern, but scurried across the veranda. On second thought, however, he turned back. If, as he supposed, he had been the victim of hallucination, he had best face it now in time to offer suitable propitiations to the angry gods. But if what he had witnessed was fact, truly miraculous, who then would believe him without proof? In any event, for his own peace of mind he had to investigate, and since Prutter dorai had already decided on dismissal, the sooner done the better.

With trembling fingers he struck a match to his lantern and crept cautiously along the veranda to the steps which led up the outside wall of the bungalow to the second floor. The door was locked, but, by virtue of a latchkey with which he as cook had been provided, he opened it and mounted the narrow flight of concrete stairs.

The daring of it all made his breath come in short gasps, and he was quite winded by the time he reached the bathroom door. Nevertheless, he was careful to check his panting and listen before trying the knob. Except for the gentle snoring which came from the direction of the front veranda, the bungalow was quiet. Anathan gave the door a push. It swung open with a harsh creak that made him wince in alarm. He listened again for the snoring. It continued, even and uninterrupted, and after a moment he stepped into the bathroom.

As he raised his lantern to look around, the dull rays of light fell on something shiny, something pink and white submerged in a glass of water. Anathan came closer. There in the tumbler, just where Prutter dorai had put them, was a full set of teeth, magnified to enormous size by the refraction of the water.

Beads of perspiration burst out on Anathan's forehead, and his heart for an instant seemed to stand still. The sight was beautiful, fabulous, breath-taking, beyond the wildest labors of his imagination. He set the lantern and latchkey down on the washstand and approached the glass. What wonder was this? What miracle of miracles!

He hesitated, feeling that at any moment he might collapse from sheer delight. Then tenderly, eagerly, trembling from head to foot, he inserted his extended forefinger into the water, down, down, until the tip of it touched the smooth, hard surface. He withdrew it quickly as if he had received a shock, and hurried toward the door. Then remembering his lantern, he paused and went back. He did not pick up the lantern, however. His gaze was fixed on the teeth, and suddenly he knew the temptation was going to be too much.

Nauseated with excitement, he reached into the glass again and removed the teeth. After all, he said to himself, what harm could there be in trying them on—a test fitting, so to say, just once, for size? He looked around. All was quiet. His mouth salivated with anticipation.

Carefully he slipped them in place, electrified by the sudden contact of the cool surface with his hot gums. They fitted neatly, almost as if they had been made especially for him and belonged in his mouth. He closed his lips over them several times. Ah, he breathed, what incomparable ecstasy—to feel the slipperiness of teeth there again.

He turned and looked at himself in the mirror. The teeth filled out his hollow face, gave it more body. As if by magic his lower jaw seemed somehow more pronounced, less receding. He actually felt like a young man again. He opened and closed his mouth. The teeth opened and closed. He smiled and in the mirror a handsome smile flashed back at him.

Completely forgetful of time and place, Anathan began preening and strutting around the room. He was not such a bad-looking chap after all—and much younger and bigger than he had imagined. He smiled again, and deep inside him he felt the thrust of renewed self-confidence.

At that moment a thought occurred to him. He went to the bedroom door and listened. The dorai and doraisani were sleeping soundly. He pressed the teeth thoughtfully with his tongue. Surely there could be no harm in wearing them around for a while—long enough to get the feel of them and perhaps have done with that little interview with his wife. Then the teeth could be returned, and behold! no one would know the difference.

So long as it does no harm, he thought, I see no reason why I should not be entitled to a few moments of joy.

Having made this decision, he picked up his lantern and went down the back stairs to the veranda, where he carelessly pulled the door shut behind him. His steps were light and gay, his head raised nonchalantly into the night. He felt permanently immunized against anything Tirumbala might do to him. However, by the time he reached the servants' quarters, he discovered that this feeling had been considerably reduced.

The door to his hut was locked, and when Anathan tried it the gardener's pye-dog began barking. "Tsst!" Anathan said. "Tsst! Don't you recognize me, dog?"

He knocked again and his wife called crossly, "Yarru? Who is it?"

"It is I, Anathan," he said, adding in an obnoxiously ingratiating voice, "your adoring husband." He hated himself for that, but Tirumbala seemed to bring it out in him.

"Go away," she said. "I have no husband who loses his job and comes home late."

"But amma, the job is not lost yet. Besides, there was extra work to do. Please let me in."

"Well do I know your tricks. You make extra work in order to stay away from me. Go. Sleep elsewhere."

In a sudden burst of anger, Anathan kicked the door with such force that the latch gave way on the inside and swung open. Tirumbala stood, hands on hips, blocking his path and looking at him indignantly. He brushed past her before she could get a word out.

"Well?" she asked.

He set the lantern down. "Well what?"

"What took you so long?"

"I told you. There was extra work to do." He went over to the clay charcoal burners and peered into one of the smoking pots. "What is there to eat?"

"Nothing for a lazy, jobless scamp who does not come home on time. Everything is eaten." She eyed him suspiciously. There seemed to be a mysterious smile on his lips, and it was obvious her words had ceased to have a telling effect. "What mischief lurks in that rattlebrain head of yours?"

"Mischief?" Anathan said. "Mischief?"

"You are thinking something, or you have done something and you are not telling me."

"My dear, surely you must be mistaken. As usual, I think nothing. I am only hungry."

"You have been drinking, then. Your speech sounds different. Come, open your mouth and let me smell your breath."

"I will not open my mouth," Anathan said, "and I have not been drinking."

Tirumbala tried in various ways to coax, threaten, cajole, wheedle and pry the secret from behind that mysterious smile, but it could not be done. Exasperated, she came over to him and peered into his face. "You are hiding something," she accused. "You are hiding something in your mouth. Open it." He refused, and when she tried to force his lips apart, he bit her fingers so hard that she recoiled with a howl of pain. "Teeth!" she said. "You have bitten me with teeth!"

"Yes," said Anathan, "I have bitten you with teeth. And I shall also strike you with a stick if you speak one word of this to anyone." He made a gesture with the back of his hand to show that he meant what he said. In a way he wished she would give him an excuse to bite her again. Doing so had produced a most pleasurable sensation, a feeling of satisfaction, as it were, of completeness. Tirumbala, however, did not seem the least bit inclined to challenge him a second time, so he said, "Now fix my food, woman," and sat down leisurely while she hurried about her tasks.

There was a look of fear in her eyes, yet as her hands placed his food before him he thought he detected a note of admiration. Not only had an old score been settled, but some long-neglected balance seemed well on the way to being restored.

Anathan was satisfied. He ate heavily, chewing his food with gusto. When he was full, he burped loudly and directed his wife to clear away the banana leaf and leftovers. Then he leaned back against the wall while she unrolled the mats, covered him with a blanket and, turning out the lamp, lay down beside him. In the dark he could hear her breathing, and he knew she was probably staring wide-eyed at the ceiling, wondering what had come over him. He rolled over onto his side and covered her with part of the blanket. As he lay back, he felt her hand take his questioningly.

I shall let her ponder this for a while, he said to himself, whistling softly and picking his teeth. Little does she imagine ——

He sat bolt upright. The teeth! he almost said aloud. Without bothering to relight the lantern, he got up and dashed across the compound to the bungalow. When he reached the veranda he found the door to the back stairs closed, and then remembered that he himself had thoughtlessly pulled it shut behind him. He fumbled around for his latchkey. It was not there. Iyo! he moaned. I have forgotten it. In my haste I have left it on the washstand. There was no way of opening the door, for it locked automatically from the inside—a safety precaution against thieves.

Beside himself with despair and anxiety, Anathan tried all the doors and windows on the first floor. It was no use. Prutter dorai, ever a thorough man, had seen to it that the bungalow was securely locked for the night. In one last determined effort, Anathan started to

What does the Gardener do in Spring?

By THE GARDENER'S ASSISTANT

Now that you have seen in this month's JOURNAL pages the new possibilities—dramatic and practical alike—of night illumination in the garden, you have probably put down lighting on your garden list along with planting, paving, fencing, fertilizing, watering and weeding. If you have, let me tell you that gardening under lights after dark can be delightful when the summer days begin to sizzle. You will be reading here on this page in June how in very dry, hot weather the wise gardener waits until the sun goes down to do the watering; but I can tell you, too, that even in the spring the gardener who sets out seedlings under electric lamps is in line for almost certain success. The two things that are tough on young and tender plants are wind and sun. The wind usually goes down with the sun; so after sunset you turn on the floodlight, unwrap your little plants, put them in the ground, soak the earth around them, and by morning they are ready to fend for themselves.

Right now in March and April, wind and sun are at their worst as far as fresh green leaves and fragile buds are concerned. Look around you, and you will see that small emerging plants, well out of the wind and partly shaded, are taking this capricious early weather in their stride. Let this be a reminder, if required, to provide an all-year windbreak for your garden—a piece of woven fencing, some husky evergreens like Scotch, white or Australian pines. Spring is not necessarily the delicate and tender season that poets sing about; for poets perhaps, but not for all your fresh young plants. This is the time of year they need protection most of all.*

Many people wonder if spring is a good time to give a feeding of fertilizer to the lawn, the garden, the trees, the shrubs. It certainly is; and the sooner the better. Take the lawn first; and as soon as it is free of frost, and the ground is firm underfoot, spread on one of the well-known all-purpose garden fertilizers. Follow the directions for how much and put it on, if you possibly can, with a good spreader. A little light spreader will do it, but a solid, well-made spreader between 24″ and 30″ wide will do it a whole lot better—more closely adjustable as to rate of spreading and less likely to drop too much fertilizer when the spreader hits a bump on the lawn, though there shouldn't be any bumps on a lawn. If a good spreader is bad for the budget, what about interesting the people around in getting a neighborhood spreader? You can do your lawn-grass seeding with it the end of August and first part of September, which is the best time for that operation in most parts of the country. You can also use it for giving the lawn a good dressing of ground limestone and organic fertilizer in October. A useful piece of equipment, if it's a good one.

About feeding the trees, the same fertilizer is called for. And rather than working it in on the surface, where with many shallow-rooted trees it may tend to coax the roots even closer to the surface (which is a poor idea), a better plan is to sink holes around the tree, pour in a good handful to a hole and soak it down with plenty of water. The most effectively located holes for the best results will be those which lie in a circle directly under the tips of the branches, which is where the root ends are. Make the holes about 2′ apart, a good 18″ deep, and about 1″ in diameter. Some people recommend a crowbar for making the holes, but anybody who has tried forcing a crowbar 18″ down in any but the softest of soil will want an easier way—even anybody who has merely tried lifting a man-size crowbar. And the tool called for here is a ground auger: not a big investment, but a tool everybody will be asking to borrow. It looks like an old-fashioned corkscrew: 1″ to 2″ bit is about right, about 3′ long, with a crosswise handle at the top. Makes a nice clean hole, good for subsurface watering as well.

Leaf-shedding shrubs, and broad-leaved evergreen shrubs, too, can be fed by scratching in the fertilizer under the whole area of the branches, then soaking it in slowly (so it won't wash away), but drenchingly, so it will sink down deep into the roots. If you have lilacs, give them a nice feeding of lime at the same time; ground limestone or hydrated lime, it doesn't make much difference. The latter works a little faster, but lilacs like them both.

Fertilizing the garden comes last, because you don't generally begin working the garden soil very much until the ground begins to warm up a little; at least you don't begin setting out tender plants or tender seeds until the warm earth is ready to take proper care of them. Some people dig the fertilizer in with the spade or rotary tiller; some spread it on the tilled earth and rake it in, and others wait and put it on around or along the growing plants. The latter is the most economical of fertilizer; the two other ways are less trouble. Always scratch the surface before putting fertilizer on top of the ground, then scratch it in and water well. Don't worry about putting on too much, within reason; but if you put on a lot, water it in with particular thoroughness.*

There may seem to be a great deal here about watering; but it's nothing to what will be here on this page in June, for this is by far the most misunderstood and misapplied of all garden operations, and without any doubt the most important.

If you plan to set out any bare-rooted, non-evergreen trees or shrubs this spring, do so the first minute the ground is fit for digging, for the roots must become well adjusted to their new root run, and be in good working order, by the time the tree or shrub begins to put forth its leaves or flowers.

Buying bare-rooted trees and shrubs is the least expensive way, and a perfectly good way if the plants are not too large, or if they aren't plants that should not be transplanted with bare roots. On these matters, unless you are well informed yourself, you must rely on the dependability of the nurseryman's advice. So let the buyer beware; or as it has come down to us in Latin—caveat emptor!

And let the buyer beware especially of any bare-rooted plant whose roots have been exposed to the sun and wind. Don't dream of buying any such trees or shrubs, or of letting this happen to any you handle. Wind and sun will dry out the tiny roots almost instantly, and do irreparable damage. Keep dampened burlap around them; and a good idea is to keep at hand a bucket or tub of watery mud, like thick soup, into which to plunge the roots before planting.

Make the hole at least twice the diameter and depth of the roots. Back-fill on the bottom of the hole with good topsoil mixed with rotted manure until the hole is the right depth for the roots. Spread the roots out carefully and begin filling in around them with more good topsoil. Get your hands right in the dirt for this part of the operation. Give the plant an occasional jounce to let the earth fall in snugly around the roots, and pack the earth down firmly with your feet as you fill in. A few handfuls of bone meal mixed with the soil at this juncture will pay generous dividends. Then before the hole is quite filled, give the plant a good drenching, finishing off with unwetted topsoil, preventing any tendency for the surface to cake hard. Lastly, fashion a level shallow basin around the plant, so that rainfall and watering will not run away.

climb the bougainvillaea vines, but halfway up the flimsy latticework collapsed under him and he fell heavily to the ground.

"Hey!" a voice called from upstairs. "Who's that?" A flashlight flicked out into the night. Anathan sat very still. Then he heard Mrs. Prutter call softly, "I think it may have been a pye-dog, dear, or just a rat," and the flashlight blinked off as Prutter dorai grumblingly retired.

Limp with worry, Anathan went back to the servants' quarters. There was nothing he could do but wait for morning and try to return the teeth before they were missed.

Now Anathan had never done a dishonest thing in his life. He did not try to pad his expenses or cheat the missionaries out of a few annas here and there as was the custom among the servants. Instead he was scrupulously, almost painfully honest about everything. At the same time, his meekness made his best efforts seem ineffectual, and he knew that if the teeth were missed, Prutter dorai would not wait for proof to accuse him. Besides, he had left his latchkey in the bathroom, and a latchkey was as good as a calling card.

Thinking about these things, Anathan was unable to sleep. In the morning he left for work before dawn. He could not bear the thought of keeping the teeth in his mouth, so he tied them in the fold of his vashti for safekeeping, and the weight of them hanging there was a terrible drag on his conscience. For several hours he stood by the back door, and when the butler arrived with the alternate latchkey Anathan, on the pretext of taking drinking water upstairs, ascended the rear steps with considerable alacrity. He found the bathroom door closed. Inside he could hear someone taking a bath, so he cleared his throat to announce his presence.

No matter how busy you may think you are, you must find time for reading now, or else surrender yourself to self-chosen ignorance.
ATWOOD H. TOWNSEND

"Who is it?" Mrs. Prutter called.

"It is I, Anathan, with drinking water."

"Just leave it outside. I'll get it later."

Reluctantly Anathan set the kusa down and went back to the kitchen. From that moment on work was a veritable pain for him. He found himself getting all mixed up—even in the littlest things. At any moment he expected someone to come bursting into the kitchen and accuse him of taking the teeth.

Much to his discomfort, no one came at all, and the theft, if it was discovered, apparently caused no alarm. Work went on as usual, but with one notable exception: Mrs. Prutter seemed to have experienced a complete transformation. After chota she came out to the kitchen, thanked Anathan for the fine job he was doing, and assured him that if he kept it up there would be a raise for him next month. In the same commanding but cheerful manner she went about giving orders for the day, making suggestions and bestowing compliments. None of the servants ever remembered having seen her so lively and capable. And not once did she say anything about teeth.

Prutter dorai, on the other hand, was reluctant to put in his appearance at all. He did not come down to breakfast, and a tray, consisting of poached eggs, milk toast, fruit juices and coffee, was taken up to him by the butler who duly bruited this startling piece of information about. Eventually he did come downstairs, toward midmorning and at Mrs. Prutter's instigation, it was reported. But he did so with lagging steps and a sorry expression on his face. The only time Anathan saw him at all was just before luncheon, when he took a glass of lime juice to him in the study. He was surprised then to see how deflated, how discouraged, listless and old-looking the dorai seemed, and he observed with no small bit of interest that, far from being the large man he had imagined, Mr. Prutter was on an exact same level with himself.

All this time Anathan had found no opportunity to return the teeth. What was more, neither Mr. nor Mrs. Prutter mentioned the loss or gave any indication that anything was missing. Mr. Prutter was far too silent and withdrawn, and Mrs. Prutter was too busy. She had metamorphosed into an amazing bundle of energy. She steamed this way and that, cheerfully taking charge of household accounts, directing the servants, handling Mr. Prutter's correspondence, meeting people, dealing with complaints, and so forth. These were all matters Mr. Prutter had reserved as exclusively his own. And now Mrs. Prutter had entered the realm with boldness and an enthusiasm that was catching. The servants, taking their cue from her, bustled about their work with much laughter and chatter, where before they had always moved quietly and unobtrusively because Mr. Prutter insisted work be done that way.

In the past when anything was missing, the dorai would come storming out to the servants' quarters, round up all the help, and subject each to a grueling cross-examination. His silence now, his meekness, was to Anathan both terrifying and a wee bit pitiful. He worked all morning long in a dither of suspense, imagining that Mr. Prutter knew all along who had taken the teeth but was biding his time only until he could dream up a punishment to fit the crime.

Obviously the silence could not go on much longer. It was all a trick to terrify the thief. Something was bound to break: either Mr. Prutter or Anathan. Anathan therefore went about his work with unusual energy, expecting the sky to fall on him at any moment.

The sky did not fall, nor did Mr. Prutter break. However, that afternoon when work was well in hand, Mrs. Prutter summoned the servants into the living room and asked them all to sit. Apparently she had summoned Mr. Prutter, too, for he was present, although he refused to face the audience and sat with his back turned, pretending to look over the books in the bookcase.

"I've called you all in," Mrs. Prutter said pleasantly, trying to put them at their ease, "because I need—we need—your special help." She smiled and looked at each servant. "You see, Mr. Prutter has lost his teeth."

Anathan placed his forehead on his hand and pondered his big toe. The other servants looked awkardly at one another, but said nothing. It was obvious from their behavior that they did not believe Mrs. Prutter and were now wondering how anyone so nice as she could tell such a colossal lie.

"Come here, dear," Mrs. Prutter said to Mr. Prutter. "I'm afraid you'll have to show them what I mean."

Mr. Prutter grimaced. "I refuse to be humiliated," he lisped.

"Now, dear," said Mrs. Prutter, "it's all for the good. I'm sure everyone will understand." She turned him around and made him open his mouth. "Wider. And do lean forward a bit." Mr. Prutter closed his eyes for shame. "There. You see," she said to the servants, "no teeth."

A murmur of amazement, of bewildered awe swept over the little gathering. "But how is such a thing possible?" the butler asked, first to voice the general reaction. "One day the dorai has many teeth both above and below, and the next his mouth is empty, even as Anathan's." Everyone looked at Anathan and nodded as if he were an authority on that subject.

"The dorai lost his teeth some time ago," Mrs. Prutter explained, "and for a long while now he has been wearing teeth which look just like real ones but actually are false. Every night he takes these out and puts them in a glass of water to keep them clean ——"

Mr. Prutter seemed to suffer a relapse and sank back with a groan into an easy chair. The servants, all keenly interested in this miracle of modern science, wanted to have the whole thing carefully demonstrated. A glass of water was brought and placed at Mr. Prutter's side to give the illusion of reality while he went through the proper motions to show just how it all worked. Everyone was talking excitedly and crowding around for a better look into the dorai's mouth.

After they had calmed down, Mrs. Prutter said, "Last night the dorai placed the teeth in the glass of water as usual. Then he turned out the light and went to bed. In the morning when he came to put them on, they were gone."

The servants immediately came up with a variety of explanations to show that none of them could possibly have committed the theft, and some even went so far as to suggest that the teeth, being more or less a work of magic, might very well have walked off by themselves. This gave rise to a whole new line of speculation, and in the next few minutes many ideas were proffered, ideas which pointed the finger at everything from mischievous squirrels to evil spirits. Mrs. Prutter swiftly ruled out most of these and hastened to assure the servants that she was accusing no one. She said she knew none of them could have taken the teeth, because up until now it had all been kept secret. Besides, she explained, she had no reason to mistrust her own help, and the teeth were valueless to anyone but the owner. Therefore it followed that whoever took them did so out of curiosity, and since the bungalow was not broken into during the night, the thief must have been an animal—say a rat, or a crow.

"I don't suspect any of you," she said, "but I would like you all to help me find them. A search must be started right away because Mr. Prutter is at loss without the teeth. He will offer a reward of ten rupees." This was the cause for a fresh burst of excitement. Nothing as thrilling as this had ever happened in Meigudy. Mrs. Prutter turned to Anathan. "I would like you," she said, smiling at him, "to be responsible for organizing the search."

In confusion Anathan opened and closed his mouth several times without saying anything. Organize a search for teeth he himself had stolen! It gave him the lie in a very painful way, especially since he was far from being a master at the art of dissimulation. But the fear of discovery spurred him on to a quick

Jayne: "And the private way, Steve. Right at home."

Steve: "Check. About 15 minutes before each meal, we each take one or two Ayds, as directed. Immediately, Ayds low-calorie appetite-depressant begins working."
Jayne: "And Ayds vitamin and mineral candy supplies needed nutritional elements, too."
Steve: "Double-check. When we're ready to eat, our hunger has faded. Without having to struggle, we push aside those high-calorie foods. We eat less with ease."

Jayne: "And lose weight automatically!"
Steve: "Triple-check. And following the Ayds Plan we never suffer from nervousness, sleeplessness or other unpleasant side effects."
Jayne: "Tell everyone how we read about Ayds in a magazine article."
Steve: "Sure. In the article, Ayds was called 'candy that makes you thin.' It reported that at a New England clinic doctors tested 240 overweight people."

Jayne: "And Ayds users lost nearly twice as many pounds as users of the next best weight-reducing product. You can send for a reprint of the Medical Journal report."
Steve: "It's free, too. Before reducing, see your doctor and have him write: Campana, Box MD, Batavia, Illinois."
Jayne: "That was fine, Steve. Let's get ready for dinner."
Steve: "Swell. I'll get the Ayds."

and convincingly enthusiastic reply, "Yes, amma, very well, amma." And for some reason he found himself rising to meet the responsibility with eagerness.

A plan formed in his mind. It would be necessary to conduct the search with the utmost enthusiasm in order to throw suspicion the other way. Then, while everyone was busy, the teeth could be placed in a spot where they could easily be discovered. In a commanding voice, utterly unlike himself, he organized the small group, told them to separate and cover the entire bungalow thoroughly, then the grounds. The servants did exactly the opposite. They all moved in a group, shouting and calling to one another as they went from room to room. They undid the bungalow in amazingly short order. Furniture was overturned, clothes removed from closets and bureaus, books and pictures pulled down. As the confusion grew, Anathan saw the success of his little scheme grow distant. By suppertime he had abandoned all hope of returning the teeth that day and angrily told the servants to clean up the mess.

News spread swiftly about the town during the night. In the morning the better part of the population gathered outside the bungalow to assist in the search. Shops were closed, plows left standing in the paddy fields, and work of any description was utterly neglected. It was necessary for Mr. Prutter to display his toothless gums well over a hundred times that morning, carefully explaining each time just how false teeth worked. If he had not been so well known for his ferocious teeth, no one would have believed him. But now they saw for a fact that where there had been broad, terrifying molars, bicuspids and incisors, there were only soft, harmless and quite normal gums.

Several bold and unbelieving Thomases even insisted on touching the gums with the forefingers. Like it or not, Mr. Prutter was forced to tilt his head this way and that to satisfy all comers and show that he was not trying to pull some sort of trick. He was kept out on the veranda all day, first by one group, then by another. As his fame spread, people came in from surrounding villages to see the dorai and help in the search. Mr. Prutter knew no peace. He felt much like a Samson without hair, deprived of strength and helpless before the howling Philistines.

At first he was terribly upset and ashamed and embarrassed. It was quite a comedown for him, and he confessed rather than told his story. But after a while, after he had said it over and over, he warmed to the task and even began to smile. When you got right down to it, the Philistines were really not such a bad sort after all, and actually quite human in their curiosity and desire to help. It surprised him to learn that no one scorned him for having false teeth. He was not sure why, but he had always supposed that people would belittle him if they knew.

By the end of the third day he was even enjoying himself, slapping backs with the men and exchanging jokes in the vernacular. People were truly amazed at how human he was. He told them the story of his teeth, how he had lost them in the first place, about being fitted at the dentist's, and then of his personal concern about keeping it secret. The villagers in turn assured him that he had nothing to be ashamed of. In fact, they said, they considered it an honor to meet a man with removable teeth. They meant this. If there had been a dentist around, no doubt a substantial part of the population would have knocked their teeth out, for the idea of having false ones was fast becoming such a cosmetic fad that several crude attempts had already been made.

During the week of the search, the church was thronged by hundreds of people where once there had been a dismal and unenthusiastic twenty-five. Mr. Prutter was forced to give many sermons to satisfy the people who insisted on listening for hours on end to his soft, lisping words. It did not stop with church. They began coming daily to the bungalow to talk with him and wrangle about one thing or another. They brought their disputes for him to settle, and sores for him to heal, for it was supposed that false teeth had somehow endowed the dorai with special qualities. And in vehemently denying this, Mr. Prutter found ample opportunity to digress onto more educational topics. His words carried a freshness, enthusiasm and authority in consequence of which the church membership increased to five hundred. Everything was a bustle of activity. But more than that: Anathan thought he detected a new bond of tenderness established between Mr. and Mrs. Prutter, not unlike the tenderness he had rediscovered with Tirumbala.

All the while, the teeth were burning a hole, as it were, in Anathan's vashti. He went about his work industriously and eagerly, but the crowds made it impossible for him to return the teeth without casting suspicion on himself or some innocent person.

Of course it was only a matter of time. He could not keep the teeth in his vashti indefinitely. Sooner or later he had to succumb to the temptation of trying them again.

When he did so, the chokra boy, who always hung around the kitchen, was quick to observe and call attention to the fact. Before Anathan could deny it, the other servants descended upon him and he was forced to demonstrate the teeth. A small crowd gathered, and presently the dorai and doraisani appeared.

Mr. Prutter had been building himself up for this moment with considerable relish. He was prepared for anger. But finally, face to face with the cook, all he could do was laugh sheepishly and scratch his head.

"Well," he said, looking at his wife, "I haven't the vaguest idea of what to do with him."

"Do with him!" Mrs. Prutter said crossly. "How you talk! When a man has the goodness to find your teeth and return them, the least you can do is give him the reward."

Mr. Prutter scratched his head again and admitted this was so, only he hadn't thought of it that way.

"I suppose," he added, looking skeptically at the teeth Anathan humbly held out to him, "I suppose that since I've already ordered a new pair made for me, he might just as well keep these."

"As you wish, dear," said Mrs. Prutter. "And now I think everyone ought to get out and let the cook finish his work." She shooed the crowd out the door. Then as she turned to go, she reached into the pocket of her skirt and handed Anathan a small package neatly wrapped in newspaper. "I think this belongs to you," she said.

Anathan felt it. It was the latchkey. END no longer, though of course it is a bit more trouble. Simmer in a cup of salted water a cup or so of fresh or frozen scallops, cut into bite-size pieces, for about five minutes. Drain them, and save the liquid, please, adding to it two chicken-bouillon cubes. Put the scallops aside and forget them for the moment: heat a pint of fresh or frozen and thawed oysters just until the edges curl a bit. Add the oyster liquid to the scallop liquid and set the oysters side by side with the scallops. Also have on hand a cup of cooked, cleaned and deveined shrimps and two cups cooked chicken cut into nice chunky bite-size pieces. Last, but certainly not least, have a cup of lobster, fresh, frozen or canned, cut into pieces suitable to bite. Save any liquid from these and add to the scallop-and-oyster broth. For the sauce, sauté a cup sliced fresh or canned mushrooms in six or so tablespoons butter until golden brown. Grate half a medium-sized onion over the mushrooms, sprinkle with three tablespoons chopped green pepper and three tablespoons chopped pimiento. Add six tablespoons flour and blend until smooth. Add enough milk to the fish broths to make two cups in all. Stir it gradually but vigorously, so it won't make lumps, into the butter, flour and mushrooms in the skillet, making a thick cream sauce. Season with a teaspoon Worcestershire sauce and a good quarter teaspoon of prepared mustard. Stir in a cup of light cream and heat a few seconds longer. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Now. For a casserole: Arrange the fish and chicken in separate layers in a two-quart casserole. Pour the sauce over and bake in a slow oven, 300° F., for forty-five minutes to an hour, or until bubbly. The casserole may be stored in the refrigerator until an hour before heating (but must stand at room temperature one hour before you heat it, so it won't crack). For a chafing dish: This is sheer glamour. Add the chicken and fish to the sauce and heat well. Serve over or with corn-bread squares which have been split, buttered and toasted. Or wild rice, buttered and seasoned with onion salt. For a sauce with the corn-bread ring: Pour fish-and-chicken mixture into the center well in the corn-bread ring, serving the rest of the sauce around the ring.

CORN BREAD

We're giving you a sugarless corn-bread recipe—it tastes best with the chicken-and-lobster dish. Beat four eggs with a rotary beater. Add one and a third cups of milk and two thirds cup of melted butter. Sift two and two thirds cups flour with one and a third cups corn meal, six teaspoons baking powder and a teaspoon of salt. Make a well in the dry ingredients and add the liquid all at once. Stir just enough to mix. If you want to make corn sticks: Preheat well-greased iron corn-stick pans. Fill the pans with batter three quarters full and bake for 20–25 minutes in a hot oven, 400° F. Makes twenty-eight sticks. Cut the recipe in half if desired. (Extra corn sticks may be frozen and reheated for other meals, if you're in the mood to make more than you need for your party.) To make the ring mold: Preheat a well-greased two-quart aluminum ring mold. Fill three fourths full and bake in a moderately hot oven, 375° F., for 20–25 minutes, until golden brown. To make corn-bread squares: Preheat a well-greased approximately 13″x 9″x 2″ aluminum baking pan. Fill three fourths full and bake in a 375° F. oven for 25–30 minutes, until golden brown. When baked, cut into squares; split, butter and toast before serving.

FRENCH DRESSING

Mix together in a shakable jar a cup of olive or salad oil, three tablespoons cider vinegar, a tablespoon of tarragon vinegar and about half a teaspoon prepared mustard. Add a teaspoon salt, half a teaspoon celery seed, half a teaspoon mustard seed, half a teaspoon paprika and a tiny pinch of turmeric. Shake together vigorously. Add two cloves garlic and one medium onion, peeled and cut in half. Allow the dressing to stand at room temperature for an hour so that all ingredients become fast friends, then remove onion and garlic (unless, of course, you like very oniony-garlicky dressing. Then leave them in an hour or so longer.) Chill before serving. Makes a cup and a half of dressing.

BECAUSE YOU WOULD NOT BEND

By LOLA S. MORGAN

Because you would not bend
the dream nor mold
The shape of beauty into something less Than its first form which no small life could hold,
You walk upright but dwell with loneliness.
Because your mind rejected compromise
And turned from crumbs to ask both wine and meat,
You thirst and hunger who might otherwise Have tasted love and found its flavor sweet.
Perfection wears a proud, unyielding face
And strides beyond the fumbling reach of men;
In vain you waited for a dream embrace,
Now youth is gone and will not come again.
Lacking the sun, you turned from lesser light,
But half a loaf would feed your heart tonight.

COCONUT FROZEN VELVET WITH STRAWBERRIES

Do you know how to open a coconut? There are some wizards with the fine technique of a diamond cutter—one swift, sure blow with a hammer and there is all the delicious white coconut meat open before you. Others have to hammer away like mad. Whatever type of coconut opener you happen to be, make sure you extract the juice, or "milk," first. The best way is to hammer a nail into each of the three little dots at the end of the coconut, turn upside down and drain. Then hammer the coconut till you break it open. (Warming it in the oven a few minutes before cracking makes the meat come away from the shell more easily.) Or use canned or packaged shredded coconut, which is easier, and also delicious. Well, then, to get on with the recipe. Finely chop two cups of grated coconut, canned or freshly grated. If you use fresh, one coconut will be plenty. Add the coconut to two cups of milk (if you use fresh coconut, use the coconut juice, and enough additional milk to make two cups). Add a cup of sugar, an envelope of unflavored gelatin and a pinch of salt. Stir well and bring to a simmer. Continue simmering ten minutes. Then strain. Pour liquid into freezing tray and freeze until it's snowy around the edges—about one and a half hours. Then beat in a cold bowl until softened. Fold in six stiffly beaten egg whites and half a teaspoon vanilla. Pour into a six-cup ring mold and freeze until firm. This will take about three hours. If you don't have a ring mold, pour into two freezing trays and spoon out into a big bowl when ready to serve. Be sure the control of the freezing section of your refrigerator is at the coldest point before freezing. END

TOMATO RICE CASSEROLE—Featuring Fish Sticks

1⅓ cups (5-ounce package) Minute Rice
2½ cups canned tomatoes • ½ cup water
¼ cup chopped onion • 1 teaspoon salt
¼ teaspoon oregano • 1 cup grated Cheddar cheese
1 package Birds Eye (Pre-Cooked) Fish Sticks

Mix Minute Rice, tomatoes, water, onion, salt, and oregano in saucepan; simmer 5 minutes. Pour into greased 1½-quart casserole. Sprinkle with cheese. Top with single layer of fish sticks. Bake in hot oven (400°F.) 15 minutes until fish sticks are brown and crisp. Serves 4.

EGGS AND RICE AU GRATIN—New Flavor Treat

1⅓ cups (5-ounce package) Minute Rice
¼ cup chopped chives • 2 tablespoons butter
¾ teaspoon dry mustard • ¼ cup milk
6 eggs, beaten • 1½ cups grated Cheddar cheese

Prepare Minute Rice as directed on package.

To half the rice, add chives and butter. Keep warm. Blend mustard with milk. To beaten eggs, add rest of rice, milk and cheese. Scramble in melted butter until eggs are done. Arrange on platter; surround with chive rice. Serves 4 or 5.

SEVEN SEAS CASSEROLE—Minute Rice Masterpiece

1 can condensed cream of celery soup • ¼ teaspoon salt
1¼ cups water or milk • 1 teaspoon lemon juice
1⅓ cups (5-ounce package) Minute Rice
1 can (½ lb.) sea food* • 1 package Birds Eye Green Peas, thawed
Cheese slices

Mix soup, salt, water, and lemon juice in saucepan. Bring to a boil over medium heat; stir occasionally. Pour a third into greased 1½-quart casserole. In layers, add half the Minute Rice (right from the box), half the sea food, and half the peas. Add another third of soup. In layers add remaining Minute Rice, sea food, and peas. Add remaining soup; top with cheese. Cover. Bake in moderate oven (375°F.) 20 minutes. If desired, uncover and brown under broiler. Serves 4.

*Sauté fresh or frozen sea food in butter about 3 minutes.

THE MAN IN THE CAR

drafts. It was in their lease that Lou should care for the furnace morning and evening and haul out the ashes. He was the powerful but soft-eyed, soft-spoken Polish refugee who, with his wife Wanda, took care of George's place across the ravine. Although George kept an apartment in Manhattan and, it was rumored in the village, other interests, he refused to close his country home, and Lou and Wanda must always have it in readiness against his rare visits.

Since Lou had left the fire high, she would now have to go down and put more coal on it herself and bank it for the night. Martha loathed the monstrous furnace and even more the cobwebby dark cellar in which it squatted. Why had they ever taken a house without an oil burner? Why must Drum desert her to such chores?

In her dismay at recalling the furnace she veered the car into a rut and Butch, forgetting that he had been silenced, commented matter-of-factly, "He almost fell off that time."

Had she felt the shift of weight again? She had convinced herself there was nothing in the back. Her alarm revived. I'll drive straight over the back way to George's house. Lou would never laugh at her fears. Even if their landlord was home he would never, though he might be supercilious, be unkind.

"He moved," noted Butch.

"Stop it!" she cried. The possibility of a drunken man awakening behind her was terrifying.

Lisa spoke in her small piping voice, "The baby's acting funny."

Martha quickly put a hand on him. She could feel the stiffening in his limbs. He's beginning a convulsion! She stopped the car with a jerk in the gravel circle behind the kitchen wing, her only concern now for the baby. She leaped out, gathering him to her, and ran into the kitchen with him while the other two scrambled after her. Terry's eyes were half closed, his mouth trembling. She snatched a folded sheet from the pile of laundry on top of the dryer and threw it in the sink, turned on the cold-water tap and laid the baby on the table in the middle of the low-ceilinged room to strip off his clothes.

"What's the matter with Terry?" Butch asked. He and Lisa, whose thumb had gone to her mouth as it always did when she was troubled, stood looking on, their faces frightened, eyes big.

Instantly Martha regretted her previous sharpness with Butch; compassion touched her, for their littleness, their dependence, and she said quietly, "He's sick." She managed a little smile for them. "He'll be better soon."

With the baby wrapped in the dripping sheet, she carried him back through the house, switching on lights as she went. She snatched up the phone in the hall. Please, God, let it work. The humming filled her ear. She jiggled the receiver. Nothing happened. She couldn't wait. The doctor had told her what to do in case of emergency. She ran up to the main bathroom at the top of the front stairs.

At last Terry lay limp across her toweled lap. His temperature, by the thermometer, had come down two degrees. Tears of relief in her eyes, she laid him on the bed in her room and dragged his crib from across the hall so that she could have him near her tonight. As his fever mounted again, before his medicine had had time to take effect, there would be danger of another convulsion.

"Can I have my snow suit off now?" asked Lisa patiently.

"Oh, you poor kids!" Martha exclaimed. She led them to their room, which was connected to hers and Drum's, to take off the bulky suits. She still wore her own jacket. The bones of her fingers and wrists looked thin and brittle as her hands moved, unzippering, unbuttoning. She was a fragile girl, but she felt an upsurge of confidence because she had bested a crisis.

"I'll tell you a story," she said almost gaily, cuddling the two pajama-clad figures to her,

ASK ANY WOMAN

By MARCELENE COX

When a woman bites off more than she can chew, she probably has her mouth filled with words.

Tears: condensation caused by a cold world meeting a warm heart.

Every child born into the world should have one grandmother with an ample lap.

You get a child to adolescence by pouring into him the right ingredients, but from that point it's like watching a cake baking through a glass door: you are helpless either to prevent its falling or to assist in its rising.

In love, too, wait seven years and the discarded technique will be back in vogue again.

Frailty, thy name is not modern woman.

Wisdom of old colored lady: "If I can get a peek at folks' mattresses I know whether to hire myself out to them, 'cause people that like comfort better'n show generally has good dispositions."

One nice way to frame a husband is on the outside of a picture window—washing it.

A man with unusual knowledge is like a woman with a fancy petticoat: it's hard to forgo the temptation to display some of it.

After a young married couple financed a first Christmas in their own home, they reached a momentous decision: hereafter they will go to either his folks or her folks for the holiday.

"The reason I don't like Toby," whispered a six-year-old to the teacher, "is because he talks more than I can hear."

An optimist is a person just about to build a house.

A table with a Lazy Susan seemed the ideal solution in our family to get food without bothering the absent-minded professor who heads our household until we discovered it also is the ideal place for him to prop his newspaper.

"and then to bed." She noted the time on her wrist watch. Eight-thirty.

"What about the man in the car?" asked Butch. "Is he going to stay there all night?"

She had forgotten him. If he existed. Since the reality of the baby's illness had claimed her attention the possibility of there actually being anyone in the car seemed only one of the nightmarish fancies that came to her when she was alone at night, isolated in this house. Yet she would have to make certain to put her mind entirely at ease.

"I'll go see," she said, "and be right back."

A small door beside the sealed fireplace in the children's room led to the back stairs. She ran down to the kitchen, found the flashlight in the cutlery drawer and went out, shivering as the misty night air enveloped her. But you know no one can be there.

She went to a rear window of the car and shone the flashlight's beam onto the back seat.

There was a man lying on the seat.

He had slipped partly off and the blankets covering him had come away, exposing his head and shoulders. He was not asleep. He was dead. His skull was crushed. Where there should have been shape there was shapelessness; a dark oozing against the seat of the car. In the half of the face that was intact the eye was open and the eyeball glittered.

Martha turned away, leaning against the car as bitter waves of nausea rose in her throat. She had never been close to the violence of death. She shook uncontrollably.

At first she thought, He had an accident; he crawled into my car. But no man so wounded could have moved. Someone would have had to put him in her car. For what reason would anyone have done so, not telling her, but to hide him; and who would hide him but the person who had done this to him?

So far her mind worked and no farther. She swayed in the clutches of sickness and would have slid to the ground, welcoming the blacker night of unconsciousness, but that within the house she heard a thin calling: "Mommy . . . mommy." She had to hold on. The children.

Could I have made a mistake? Could I have imagined what I saw?

Her nails scratched on the woodwork under the window as she clung to it, forcing herself to raise the light again.

It had not been her imagination. The man was dead, brutally, irretrievably dead.

Panic was upon her then and she bolted for the house. She slammed the door and pressed one shaking hand against its stout wood while with the other she fastened the chain lock. How could he have got in the car? When? While she was at the doctor's—or, later, in the drugstore? Both times she had been parked where there was light, and people passing. She knew, with a fresh horror, that the body of the man must have been already in the car when she took it out of the barn. All that time he was there, dead, under the blankets. She shuddered.

Then this afternoon—it had to be this afternoon, no later than supper—he was carried to the barn and thrust into the back of the car. He had been killed near here, then, if the car had been the handiest expediency.

"Mommy! What took you so long?" Butch was crying down the back stairs.

"I'll be right there, darling." She fought for possession of her voice. "I have to try the phone again first."

The phone must be in operation now. She had to reach the police. Her mind went in tortuous circles as she passed through the empty, shadowy rooms to the hall. The hideous revelation of the car danced before her. Her memory stirred. He was wearing a blue shirt . . . light tan jacket . . . his hair was blond and curly, that much of it I could see. . . . Someplace I've seen him, alive. . . . In the woods behind the house? . . . I think . . . I think . . . I can't remember ——

She placed a hand on the phone. God, be with me now. There was no sound at all. Not even the humming. In a frenzy she pounded on the crossbar. It was no use.

"When are you coming up?" The children had pattered to the upstairs hall.

"Now." She began to climb on rubbery legs. I can't risk taking Terry out to go to the police. I couldn't drive knowing . . . that . . . was in the car. If I could get a message to the Fieldings or George's house . . . but they are too far away to hear me call.

Her hand gripped the worn banister. She stopped. The phone just now—when it was out of order it always hummed. The humming was gone, as though it were disconnected.

The wires have been cut. She had been horrified before; now she felt the intimate, immobilizing fear for her own safety and that of the children.

Someone cut the wires on the outside. So someone was out there in the dark when I was, watching me, seeing that I discovered the body, and he had to make sure I couldn't reach the police. He wouldn't have known the phone was out of order already. He would have wanted time to get the body away. He could only have put it there for a temporary hiding place. Why didn't he knock me out? Because he thought it wouldn't be necessary? That I'd be afraid to come out to the car again, who'd be quite certain I wouldn't leave the children alone to go for help and that I had a reason—Terry's illness—to make me hesitate to take them with me. A person who knows me. It has to be. One who knows I'm nervous when I'm by myself, who knows about the children and Terry, knows where I keep the car, used it because it was close and he wouldn't have guessed I'd be using it tonight. He must have got the wind up when I went out, hung about to see what would happen and been relieved that I didn't discover the body.

And now he's got to get rid of it. He's got to stay outside and act before I may have thought of a way to reach anyone. If I'd chance taking Terry I wouldn't dare go for help now.

She had gone on mounting the stairs slowly and reached the top. First she must keep the children from sensing her terror. That was the first thing of all. After that —— She couldn't go past that.

She carried them both to Butch's bed and read from their favorite book, hoping they didn't catch the quaver in her voice, holding them tight. But all the while she was thinking, Someone who knows me.

Yet who did, in this town where they were still strangers? Who but Jonas and his wife, Lou and Wanda, George Rochefort himself? Any of them could have known Terry was sick and that she would probably be staying in tonight. She had remarked to Jonas that he seemed feverish; had a word with Lou, telling him she was going to call the doctor. They would have repeated this to their wives. Both Wanda and Alice knew she was timid about being alone in the house. For lack of friends she confided in whoever would listen. George Rochefort would know all about her from his servants. Any of them. But who else?

A stair creaked. She jumped. The night wind tapped a tendril of wisteria against the pane by the bed. Downstairs one of the loose shutters banged against the house. Martha felt that the night, the house itself were taking on the evil intent of whoever was outside.

It has to be one of them. I don't know which. Then if I could think of a way to get a message to either Fieldings' or the Rochefort house I wouldn't know which would be the wrong one to try.

When she finished the story she kissed the children and tucked them in. Then she did something that had never occurred to her before. She locked them in, turning the rusty keys in the locks on both the hall door and the one to the stairs. In her own room she locked the hall door. Now there was this fortress, but within the fortress what was there of use to her? Without hope she tried the second phone, which stood on her bureau. It was dead, all right. There was no gun, no weapon.

The baby's breathing was shallow but more regular than it had been. She glanced at her watch. Nine-fifteen. In less than an hour she was to awaken Terry for his medicine, but forty-five minutes was an infinity, and while the minutes passed what was he doing? . . . or she? . . . the one who was outside? Still waiting and watching? I can't stand it, she thought. Whoever it is knows I am the threat, but I cannot be certain who is the threat to me.

She sagged down on the bed. In spite of the chill which still shattered her body, she was beginning to perspire. She took off her jacket and drew a hand across her forehead. It came away wet. At the same time she heard a noise in the house, a rumbling and knocking. She jumped to her feet, thinking it was the watcher, the killer, battering down the door.

No, not that kind of noise. She realized suddenly what it was. The pipes! She had forgotten the furnace. She went to a radiator and found it red-hot. She knew what would happen. Once before she had forgotten to close down the drafts. As the fire burned up, grew hotter, steam mounted, shaking the old pipes, threatening to burst them. Lou had warned her never to let the fire go or "boom—she explode!" She had no idea how dangerous this might be.

She would have to go down and pile coal on the bed and adjust the drafts. She was afraid to let it go. But she was also afraid to leave this room. She feared for herself, but more for the children. If the furnace exploded—if the one who had put the man in her car and was now waiting for her next move should become alarmed and come after her—what would happen to the children?

The children. Always the children. Even fear didn't belong exclusively to herself any longer. She looked across the room at the photograph of Drum on the bureau beside the useless phone. His thin face laughed at her.

She thought in a wave of self-pity, You don't even know what is happening to me tonight; you don't care.

She was alone, but he would not be worried about her. "You were brought up to be self-centered," he had told her when she had protested this trip, "but you have a resilience that lifts you above yourself. I never worry about your getting along all right." Now he would be sitting safe in his hotel room, perhaps drinking a nightcap so he would sleep well before the next day's business.

Oh, is this what love is? she thought. To be alone, in need, afraid and yet not even able to think first of your own needs because love has given you children? It isn't right.

But on top of this emotion came another. Anger. Fury with the man who had killed another and thrust him, like a pile of old clothes, into her car. Who had cut the wires of her phone. Who was watching until he was certain her helplessness and fright made it safe for him to remove the body and—and what? Do what? Weight it and drop it in the water of some secluded cove? Make a fool and liar of her when at last she could tell her story to the police?

Anger mobilized her mind and body where fear had frozen it. She struck her hands together. I won't be trapped. Her glance flew wildly about the room, paused at the heavy brass candlestick on the mantel. She crossed to the fireplace and seized it. It was not much of a weapon, but its weight in her hand gave her a sense of both cunning and courage.

I don't think he will come into the house, for he would have to kill me or I could identify him, and I don't believe he is a deliberate murderer. The killing was accidental. That was why he used my car. He hadn't planned it out.

You see, she said with a faint smile to her unknown adversary, I can read your mind.

She went through the children's room and unfastened the door to the servants' wing. She listened. There was no sound to be heard above the increasingly insistent knocking of the pipes. Slowly she crept down to the kitchen. Her heart hammered rapidly in her breast, but the hand on the candlestick was steady.

She shoved back the bolt on the cellar door. A blast of stale hot air met her face. She could hear the roaring of the fire. She began to tremble. She couldn't go down there: She couldn't.

But her loathing of the powerless situation into which she had been put was greater now than her loathing of the cellar and she switched on the light and step by step crept down the stairs.

The basement light was only an unshaded bulb suspended from a cord looped over one of the rough beams and illuminating only that portion of the cellar directly around the furnace. The rest was in darkness, all the dank rooms that yawned under the house. She stopped at the foot of the stairs, again hearing nothing but the thunderous roar of the furnace. Through the open draft door at the bottom of the furnace she could see the fiery scarlet glow. Martha picked up a dusty rag and, setting down the candlestick, used the rag to protect her hand as she flung open the door to the fire bed. The heat from the inferno within sent her staggering back. She grabbed the long-handled shovel resting against the bin, loaded it with coal and aimed it at the open furnace door. The shovel clattered against the side of the door and the coal shot to the floor.

Biting her lip, she took up another shovelful. This one she threw into the fire, where it burst immediately into flames. She took another load. She was aiming a third when she noticed something at the back of the bed of coals where there was still a line of unburned black. It looked like a shred of cloth.

A strange harsh thrill went through her. Lou must have tossed it in when he tended the furnace. He was trying to burn it. It's Lou. What else could he have wanted to burn but a piece of clothing he was wearing when he killed the man, something that had got bloody?

Lying on the floor near the furnace was the long-handled poker Lou used. She picked it up and in a passion of haste scraped at the bit of cloth. She pulled it out, smoldering, to the floor and stamped on it.

Now I know, she told herself. I have got to get word to Jonas somehow. An exultancy surged through her.

She went on throwing coal into the furnace until she had tamed it and covered the glowing bed with a thick layer that would take all night to burn. She kicked the bottom draft closed, left the top open and went around to the back of the furnace to prop open the draft on the pipe. Then, wrapping the charred fragment in one of the pages of newspaper stacked by the furnace, she took up the poker, leaving the candlestick behind, and ran up the cellar steps. Panting, she shot the bolt on the cellar door.

As she went around the big kitchen table her eye caught the flashlight she had left there. I can signal with that, she thought. Why didn't I think of it before?

She made the security of the upper rooms, and propped the poker against the wall. Here was a real weapon. The baby stirred. She glanced at him quickly, but he did not wake.

Martha laid the newspaper on the bed and opened it. She bent over the fragment. It was a piece of red-and-black checked shirt.

Jonas! How often she had seen him wearing it. He had been wearing it this afternoon. He must have sneaked back after Lou built up the fire. To burn it. That would have been safer than at his own house, where Alice might have caught him.

Now I've got to make them see a signal at George's house. She went to the side window which faced across the ravine. The lights of the house on the opposite hill twinkled so near through the trees. Surely she could make someone over there see her flashlight.

She turned out the lamp, opened the window and, leaning out, flashed the beam on and off experimentally. It didn't carry far, but if anyone happened to be looking this way he'd certainly understand she was signaling. SOS. Did she remember how that went from her long-ago days as a Girl Scout?

That was it. Over and over she sent the message. On and off. On and off.

God, You couldn't do anything about the phone, but please make someone see this and know what it means.

Jonas would see too. Maybe it would drive him away. If he thought help might come, he would certainly leave. He didn't know she was aware that it was he out there.

Then she heard a sound on the porch below. A footfall so slight that it was a mere scraping, a noise she would never have heard if her window had been closed. A light gentle tapping at one of the windows. He was looking for an open window!

They were all locked, she recalled with momentary relief. Yes, but he has only to break the middle pane in the upper sash to reach the catch. But they were still locked in up here. She would barricade the doors. He is a strong man. And he is desperate now. He must have been peering through a cellar window when she had discovered his identity. Martha was desperate herself. Panic was like a red veil over her mind, before her eyes. She slammed the window and wheeled around. As she did so she heard the tinkle of glass below.

Wait. You can't give way. He isn't thinking any more. He's crazy with his own fear—that I'll be able to tell what I know.

He might have got away with the other murder, but he couldn't get away with it if he did anything to her. Alice would know he had been out tonight. Alice would ——

Suddenly she had the memory of where she had seen the man in her car. In the woods. She was walking with Butch and Lisa up the path that led from the barn and she had seen him standing by a tree some little way in the woods. A handsome man with blond curling hair, bold features, nattily dressed. And coming along through the trees toward him, hurrying anxiously, brambles plucking at her skirt, was Alice. Martha had thought, So Alice isn't quite the broken-spirited creature Jonas tries to make of her. She's keeping a rendezvous. But in the press of her own problems, after Drum's news that he was leaving town, she had forgotten.

Jonas was a man who would go mad with jealousy if he discovered his wife had a lover. His pride would be enough to drive him to strike a man so hard the skull was crushed. It was his pride now which was bringing him after her. Nobody must find out. He'd care more about that than he would about his life.

But Martha had no more pride. She had no more self-pity left in her. She had only one need: to save herself and the children.

There! That stealthy sound directly beneath her. He had got in. He was in the dining room. How much time had she until he got upstairs? At most, if he paused to plan what he would do next, only minutes.

She darted to the children's room and, going swiftly to their beds, gathered one sleep-heavy child under each arm. She brought them back to her bed. Lisa cried out. Terry moved restlessly again. Neither woke. She pushed the bureau before the door to the hall. Then she took the poker, the scrap of shirt, and snatched her purse from the chair and went swiftly to the other bedroom. Her cunning now was like that of an animal, instinctive.

Against the door to the hall between the two rooms she shoved a bookcase. The children were hedged in; she did not think Jonas would stop to harm them if he did get to her. There were two more doors left. She pulled Butch's bed before the one to the wing, and as she was moving a small wardrobe before the hall door she heard Jonas on the staircase.

She was breathing hard and fast, her mouth open and the sweat pouring out—whether from heat or fear she did not know—but she was aware of one thing: her fear was different. It was a fighting fear. She would never let him reach her if she could help it.

She stood against the wall by the hall door, gripping the poker. If he did get in the room, she would strike him first. And if he killed her she would see that he was caught.

She let the poker stand beside her and bent to pick up the purse and the bit of shirt which she had dropped on the floor by her feet. She thrust the cloth inside her jacket and blouse against her flesh. Now she heard Jonas in the upstairs hall. His own breath coming harshly. The doorknob turned, rattled. His steps retreated down the hall. She heard him try the door to the other room.

Frenziedly she opened her purse, took out a small pad with an attached pencil, scribbled "Jonas Fielding" on the top piece of paper, tore it off and tucked it after the shirt scrap. She seized the poker again.

He'd never think to search me, she thought triumphantly. He'd get out fast.

He came back down the hall.

Mrs. Carroll," he called softly. "Mrs. Carr, I know you're in there. Listen, Mrs. rroll, open the door. I've got to talk to u. You've made a mistake about something ant to explain."

She pressed, silent, against the wall. He was close to her. Her breathing and his seemed be in rhythm as though they were joined in sion, not in fear.

"Mrs. Carroll." He rattled the knob again. Her grip tightened on the poker. If he came ough that door she would crash it against head as ruthlessly as he had crashed whatr weapon he had used—rock or hammer—inst the head of the dead man.

"I can get in, you know."

Her lips stretched in a smile that bared her th. She said nothing. Come ahead, then. I'm dy for you.

There was a shattering blow against the or. He had hit it with his shoulder. How g could the old wood sustain such an ault?

A second splintering crash against the door. e wardrobe jolted away from it. She pushed back, crouched down, leaning against it th all her strength. She could hold out ger this way, and when at last the door ve, the piece of furniture would be her shield d she would rise from behind it to strike.

The doorbell chimed.

Laughter gurgled in Martha's throat. It was h a small, ridiculous civilized sound in this ght of violence. It chimed again and she did gh, hysterically, and then she realized what meant. Her signal had been seen!

She rushed to the window, flung it open. 'm here! Help me!"

The next best thing to a really good woman is a really good-natured one.
WILLIAM MAGINN

"It's the police," came a man's voice from der the portico of the carriage entrance low. "What's going on here?"

"A man's trying to break in my room. Can u get in?"

"We'll get in," the voice said grimly.

Jonas had heard. He didn't wait. His heavy otsteps clattered down the stairs as glass ivered and broke on the panel of the front or Martha, bent weakly over the little ardrobe that was to have been her shield, ard him pound through the dining room d into the kitchen. The back door was ammed open.

She pulled back the wardrobe and opened e door. It was only as she noticed the shakg of her hands that she realized they had en steady for a long time until now.

A man's voice was calling her in the lower all. From somewhere behind the house came e sharp crack of a revolver. Martha stumled down the stairs, tripped on the last step d fell, sobbing, against the young police utenant who waited for her.

"It's O.K. now, Mrs. Carroll."

A second policeman, older, stout and grayaired, came from the dining room. "I got im. Winged him in the leg. He won't be oing anywhere. There's a dead man on the round by the station wagon out there. What's appened here, lady?"

"That man was in the car. Jonas must have een trying to get him away." She sank to the eps and told her story fumbling in her louse for the scrap and her note. They listened. heir faces were comforting. Their uniforms ere comforting. It was hard to believe she as safe without having to fight for safety any onger.

After she had told them the older one said, I'll get that on the radio," and the younger ne left, saying, "I'll be back," and returned ith a glass of water. He patted her awkardly on the back.

"I'm all right," she said. "How did you now to come? Did they call you from Rochefort's? Did they see my SOS?"

"Your husband telephoned from Montreal."

"My husband!" she cried.

"I only know what we got over the radio," the policeman told her. "Your husband had tried to call you and couldn't get through. The phone wasn't working. He got worried. He called the station and we got the word, Harry and me, when we were over by the Locust Hill depot, to come here and see if everything was O.K."

"Drum," she whispered.

"He thought something might be the matter with one of your kids. Lucky for you he got the wind up."

"She was taking care of things pretty good herself." The older one had returned. "There's just a couple of things now ——"

"Oh," said Martha, "the baby! It's past time for his medicine. Will you excuse me? I'll be right back."

The older policeman laughed. "That's a woman for you. Always got the kids on her mind. Just like my wife."

Butch and Lisa slept. They had never known. Terry was awake, however, his blue eyes staring up at her. She lifted him. He was less feverish than he had been. He mewed and protested as she slid the spoonful of thick white liquid into his mouth. She cradled him against her.

I was never alone, she thought. Drum was always with me. She seemed to feel him in the room. The love she thought was gone from her when he was away was here with her.

Tears filled her eyes and it was then that, for the first time since she had found him, she thought of the man in the car in terms of what had happened to him and not in terms of what had happened to her. He was dead. He had been alive and he was dead and he was truly alone. Jonas was alone. Perhaps that was the worst loneliness of all: to have killed another.

She rocked back and forth holding Terry. But I am alive and I have strength and I have love, she told herself; I will never be alone again. END

IS YOUR MARRIAGE A MASQUERADE?

By ELIZABETH GRAHAM

Have you recently said to your husband, with an absent-minded little frown, "Dear, have you any idea what's become of that close identity we used to have? I think it's lost"? Or, more revealing, has he said to you, "You just aren't yourself these days"? If so, pause and consider—maybe you aren't being yourself. The following are "extreme" disguises, and you aren't expected to react with an emphatic, "That's me, all right!" to any one of them. On the other hand, you might take note of any clues seeming to snarl quietly as you pass—and ponder, as you check back over them, their significance to your marriage.

YOUR DISGUISE:

CLUES TO YOUR IDENTITY:

1. Your husband is so thickheaded! He doesn't see that your family means more to you than his does to him.
2. When you have a problem to solve, naturally you go to your mother for help. After all, you've known her longer than you've known your husband.
3. You think it's just plain mean of your mother-in-law to ply you with questions when she comes to visit. She is always wanting to know things like How does he like his work? and Is he getting plenty of rest? and Does he help around the house? Why doesn't she come right out and say she isn't ab-so-lutely certain you are making her child happy?
4. You deeply resent the way your husband raves like a starved maniac over his mother's creamed cauliflower. You can't choke it down him.

THE UNMASKING:

Well, ding ding ding! And how old are you, little girl? What do you want to be when you grow up—a divorcee? No? Then now is the time to learn that any attempt of yours to sever your husband's relations with his family is like suggesting he cut off his left hand: he may not need it as much as he does his right, but he would miss it if it weren't there, and eventually he might begin to think that left hand was more important to him than his right ever will be. You unnerstan'?

YOUR DISGUISE:

CLUES TO YOUR IDENTITY:

1. What you say: "You mean old stingy!"
   Translation: "Will you help me work out a budget so I can buy a new coat?"
2. What you say: "I hate you! You've broken my heart! I'm going right home to mother and I'll never, never forgive you!"
   Translation: "I love you. You've hurt me deeply. I'm going home to mother until I forgive you."
3. What you say: "You just don't understand me!"
   Translation: "You aren't a bit psychic; I see I'll have to tell you my likes and dislikes!"
4. What you say: "Cook, cook, cook! That's all I do. I'm sick of the same old routine!"
   Translation: "Darling, can we eat out tonight?"

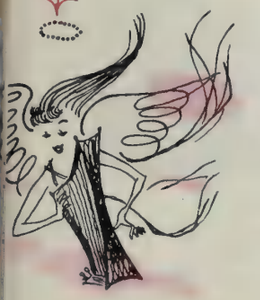
THE UNMASKING:

Life could be much more festive without that disguise. Of course if you want to give your husband ulcers, you go right ahead and speak your foreign language; there's always a slim chance you won't drive him to drink. But the kind of mystery a man finds fascinating is not the dual-meaning mask of conversation. It's the tantalizing question of, "How did I ever win you?"

YOUR DISGUISE:



CLUES TO YOUR IDENTITY:

1. Your favorite way of telling your husband you love him is by saying, "I'll kill you if you so much as look at another woman. Darling."
2. You are quick to discourage your husband's cultivation of interests and hobbies which you can't—or won't—share.
3. You expect extra-special attention from your husband when you are together at parties. To you, the most important words in the world are, "He *ob*viously worships you!"
4. You don't object to your husband's working—after all, bills do have to be paid—but you want it clearly understood that you're not playing second fiddle to anything as mere as a job.

THE UNMASKING:

It's an unbecoming costume you're wearing, does nothing for you at all. It's made from an old pattern known as Fear of Rejection, and its effect upon men is to make them feel captured, rather than captivated. There's a very successful pattern called Faith in His Love you might use as a better guide to happiness.

YOUR DISGUISE:

CLUES TO YOUR IDENTITY:

1. You say frankly that you wouldn't veto your husband's suggestions and carry out your own if it weren't for the simple fact that yours are always better.
2. You feel certain that if your husband would just co-operate, you could help him overcome his many bad habits. One of which being his rude insinuation that you yourself could stand improvement.
3. To compromise with your husband over some difference of opinion would, you feel, only serve to weaken his confidence in your judgment.
4. You sometimes suspect your husband of making sly little attempts to arouse your anger: falling asleep after dinner; working overtime when company is expected; mowing the lawn when you need something from the grocery.

THE UNMASKING:

Must concede, you play the harp well. Obviously, your theme song is "I'd Rather be Right Than be Married," plucked to the tune of "I'm the Lonesomest Gal in Town." Your attitude is described gravely by psychiatrists as one of "rigidity"—and that is lightly interpreted to mean unthinking stubbornness. Actually, you are probably a very nice person in a lot of ways, and once you discover the hidden delight of admitting occasionally you could be wrong, you'll soar through the air under your own power!

YOUR DISGUISE:

CLUES TO YOUR IDENTITY:

1. You have frequent headaches, which vary in their intensity: the less you want to do something, the worse the ache.
2. People don't expect much of you because you aren't very strong. And, frankly, the situation offers advantages which greatly diminish your interest in hardy good health.
3. You seldom finish the projects which you so gaily start. You don't admit that it's because you're "not interested" any more; you always say you're "too tired."
4. One false move from your husband and you dissolve into tears of rage and resentment, reminding him once again of the *kind*hearted men you could have married.

THE UNMASKING:

You might go through the Looking Glass often enough, but you forget to look into it. If you did, you would see a person spending time and energy in a search for escape, rather than enjoying the pleasures at hand. Relax. Take up singing—and when practicing the musical scale, don't dwell on the "mi."

THESE SEVEN PEOPLE WERE SAVED FROM CANCER

very year 3500 Americans die of skin cer. For skin cancer, like any other, has y one course when it is untreated. But, ically, only a tiny fraction of skin cancer's 0 yearly victims need die. Skin cancer, the st common cancer of all, is the most cur-e. n 1902 Myrtle Burt was the youngest , many maintained, the fairest of the San ncisco Florodora Sextet. Two years later was married to vaudeville comic Frank t, and the pair began a long career in show iness together.

n 1943, Myrtle's daughter Miriam was fway through the writing of a chronicle of career, under the title Mother Wore hts, which later became a Betty Grable . "That," says Myrtle Burt, "was when I iced the first warning signs."

What Mrs. Burt noticed was a discharge of od from the rectum. "I hadn't felt very erent," she says. "I guess cancer sort of aks up on you."

Myrtle Burt's family doctor sent her to the tal clinic of a cancer hospital. There, the t day, Mrs. Burt learned that she had cer of the lower colon.

"We don't panic," she says proudly. "It sn't long before that Frank had cancer of larynx. He lost a vocal cord, but he made I thought that I could make it too."

Early in June, Mrs. Burt entered the hos-al for a week of preliminary treatment t would lead to surgery. Then on June 12, 3, they operated.

No one could tell Mrs. Burt whether or not had come in time. "I simply left myself in d's hands," she says, "and those of the geon. After all, what else can anyone do?" The surgery was radical. Through a long ision in the abdomen, the entire lower estine was removed. It is often safer to do s than to risk leaving stray cancer cells hind. The rectum was closed off and a small ening made in the abdomen, through which ste could pass.

This operation, known as a colostomy, is formed on thousands every year. It leads, viously, to a certain inconvenience. But it d not interfere with a normal life.

"After five weeks," says Mrs. Burt, "I was me from the hospital, and two weeks after t I was doing all my own work. Now I eat rything and do everything I ever did be-e."

Mrs. Burt is one of 68,000 men and women o develop cancer of the rectum or large estine each year. Twenty-five per cent of victims recover. But many more could e, should live.

Bleeding is one of the signs of intestinal or tal cancer. But it may not occur until too e. For this reason, doctors urge that per-ing changes in normal bowel habits be sus-ct. Aches, pains, discomfort in the ab-men may also be clues.

Admittedly these hints may be subtle. So is wisest to submit to a yearly medical eckup which should include a thorough tal examination, and at that time mention y continuing intestinal symptoms. Polyps, identally, small benign tumors which grow the intestines and rectum, are precancerous. ey should be removed or destroyed as soon they are discovered.

And polyps seem often to be hereditary. a family history of these little tumors is a od reason for a painstaking examination of lower intestines.

Says Myrtle Burt, "Some people are fright-ed of the surgery that often goes with can-. They're afraid that their lives will be dif-ent afterward. But if you have a nice apple th a rotten spot in it, you can still cut out spot and enjoy the apple. That's how it is th cancer. Frank and I still enjoy our lives."

Nathan Hirsch had never been bothered the large black mole on his shoulder. He not even sure how long he'd had it. When, ring the course of a routine examination, a ctor had said, "Better get rid of that," rsch readily consented.

Not long after there was a little black spot nearby, and Hirsch was in the office of a specialist. "I'm not absolutely sure what it is," the specialist said, "but I'd like you to see a colleague of mine." And he gave Hirsch a paper and an address.

It was 1933, and Hirsch, at 41, had never felt better. But he complied with the specialist's suggestion. "Something in the tone of his voice," he explains.

The colleague made an examination and asked him to enter a hospital for surgery. "I never pressed very hard for an exact diagnosis," says Hirsch. "I guess I didn't want anyone to say it. I knew it was cancer. And I knew it was serious. I felt I had to keep it from my wife."

Nathan Hirsch did try to keep it from his wife. He didn't know then—nor did he know until years later—that she'd already talked with the surgeon, and that he'd diagnosed the spot as melanoma, black cancer, that he had given Hirsch eight months to live.

The surgeons performed what they called "a radical auxiliary dissection of the lymph nodes." This means that the cells from the original melanoma had migrated and begun to grow a new colony elsewhere—a metastasis. It means that in a desperate, but somewhat pessimistic, effort large amounts of tissue from the shoulder and the underarm were cut away, in the hope that the cancer hadn't colonized elsewhere.

On his hospital chart, after surgery, Hirsch caught sight of the word melanoma. "What is it?" he asked his doctor just once.

"Do you read French?" the doctor asked, offering a big volume.

Hirsch shook his head and waited. He saw his doctor every few days, cut his sweater-manufacturing business to a volume he could handle. Then, suddenly, there was another black spot, and another operation. Then, a month later, there was another, and more surgery. The melanoma cells were loose, colonizing, invading, killing.

Some six months after the first operation, Hirsch was waiting in his doctor's reception room, a weak and tired man, when another patient left. "It's really too bad," said the new receptionist.

"What's wrong with him?" Hirsch asked.

"Melanoma," she said. "It's just a matter of months."

Hirsch left the waiting room. "I hit one bar after another," he says. "I was finished. I was a dead man. All I could think of was providing for my wife and my boy somehow. I went back to my office, finally, and sat there miserable and afraid. Then I caught a glimpse of myself in the mirror, and something happened. I walked up to that image and started shouting at myself. I wouldn't care to repeat the language, but I gave myself quite a going over. Somehow it gave me back my nerve. I was going to fight this as long and as hard as I could."

During two years Nathan Hirsch developed some twenty new sites of melanoma in different areas of his body, from head to toe. Each was cut away, and he kept going. Neither he nor his surgeon would admit defeat, and somehow he went on living. "I don't know just how many scars I have, but I don't like to wear a bathing suit."

Then, no one knows why, the black spots stopped coming. The visits to the doctor became less and less frequent. That was twenty years ago. Today Hirsch is a successful businessman, working as hard as he ever did.

Says one expert, commenting on the case, "There's no known reason why he should be alive. But we know he's not the only man to beat melanoma, which is supposedly fatal. His case and others suggest that the body may manufacture a sort of antibody for cancer after a time. This might someday give us an answer to the disease.

"But Hirsch's case, in some ways, offers a still more important meaning. The diagnosis of cancer is no longer a death warrant. Even in the most desperate case there is reason to fight back."

Because melanoma usually begins in moles, cancer surgeons recommend the removal of those pigmented moles which are likely to be injured or irritated. Usually, pigmented moles on the soles of the feet, the palms of the hands and the genitalia should be removed before they can cause trouble.

As melanoma develops, the mole becomes darker, begins to grow slowly, becomes raised, and probably crusted or ulcerated. These moles must not be cauterized, treated with an electric needle or cut out by anyone but an expert surgeon.

"Today," says such a surgeon, "probably no doctor would attempt the removal of a black mole such as Nathan Hirsch's without special study and without having special qualifications. Medicine's knowledge about cancer has multiplied vastly in the past twenty years.

"Certainly it takes special training to deal with cancer. None but skilled physicians have this. There are no miracle cures for cancer, though there are legions of cancer quacks. The American Cancer Society and others have studied every purported cure for cancer, and today there are only two—surgery and radiation. Nothing else will work."

Dorothy Harper was a pretty, young blond mother of four active children. Her days were filled with caring for her family, leaving little time for herself. In 1947 she became aware of a continued vaginal discharge, and took time for a hurried checkup, dismissing the subject from her mind when she was told she had only a mild infection.

"A few months later," says Mrs. Harper, "I started bleeding slightly most of the time. I just thought it was some injury left over from childbirth, so I didn't bother about it."

Within a year Dorothy Harper was a different woman. She was unbelievably thin. ("I'm five feet, four inches tall, and I weighed ninety-five pounds.") She was so weak she couldn't do her work, and there was still the constant bleeding.

"I don't know why I was so foolish," she says. "Maybe because I was so busy. Maybe I really thought I had cancer, and I knew my mother and aunt had died of it. Maybe I just didn't want to face it."

When Dorothy Harper finally saw a doctor again, he put her into a hospital immediately for a preliminary study. Her suspicions of cancer were confirmed.

Home from a week in the hospital, she was driven every two or three days to a clinic, for high-voltage X ray. "I didn't know then how desperate the treatment was," she says. "I didn't know the doctors were risking overdoses because I had such a small chance.

"I became nauseated. I felt terribly ill. Finally I went into the hospital for a radical hysterectomy, and I was on the table seven hours. The surgeon said later that by some miracle the cancer hadn't spread from the area."

Mrs. Harper came out of the operating room holding to life by a thread. She was fed intravenously. Private nurses attended her constantly. Dorothy Harper was then 26 years old.

"It was days before I was aware of much. Then I learned that my children had been put into a public home. That's how certain they were that I was dying. My doctor was angry because I'd been told about the children, but I think it made me live."

Dorothy Harper spent months in the hospital. The operation had been successful, but for long months the cancer had slowly destroyed her health. The heroic measures to save her had weakened her still more. Complications set in. She was given twenty transfusions. She could bear to eat nothing for over a month. She weighed 70 pounds. "Then one night," she recalls, "I had the most awful urge for chocolate cookies and peanut candy."

Mrs. Harper entered the hospital in June. By December she weighed 84 pounds, and was on her way up.

By all medical logic, Dorothy Harper should have died. Today she is healthy and active, manages her four children, does her own work, and occasionally works as a photographer's model.

Cancer of the cervix and uterus composes the second cause of death from cancer among American women. Each year some 34,000 develop it. Some 15,000 die. But uterine cancer is one of the most curable of all.

Says one expert of Mrs. Harper's case, "She probably had cancer when she noticed the vaginal discharge. But the tumor was probably too small to find by ordinary examination. Today it would be found."

It would be found because of the vaginal-smear test. Uterine cancers shed cells into the vagina. When a little vaginal secretion is stained and studied under the microscope, cancer cells can usually be spotted long before the tumor has grown enough to be seen or felt.

"Certainly any woman who finds irregular vaginal bleeding should see her doctor at once," says Dr. Charles S. Cameron, former Medical and Scientific Director of the American Cancer Society. "And any continued discharge should mean a visit to the doctor.

"But, in a sense, this is not the ideal time to spot cancer. Every year, every woman over thirty-five should see her doctor for a vaginal examination and smear test, called a Uterine Cancer Cell Examination. If this were common practice, death from uterine cancer would be a rare occurrence.

"A test drive is being conducted in Memphis, in which every woman is urged to give five minutes of her time to the Papanicolaou smear test: 100,000 women were examined; 1700 biopsies were called for and 780 unsuspected cancers were found. The vast majority of these women will be cured, most without a long, serious illness. We hope someday such surveys will be nationwide. But American women, meanwhile, dare not ignore this lifesaving test."

"I'd been coughing for months," says insurance broker Warner Montague. "But I thought it was just a cigarette cough. Gradually it got worse, harsh and dry. I felt all right otherwise, though I seemed to be losing some weight.

"Then I started coughing nights, and couldn't sleep, and finally one morning Mrs. Montague told me that I better not come home again until I'd seen a doctor. I guess I went to please her."

Warner Montague's doctor questioned him, examined his nose and throat, listened to his chest. Finally he made X rays of his lungs. In the outer area of his right lung was a dark shadow. The doctor referred Montague to a specialist.

The specialist said he would have to have a specimen of the tissue that had cast the shadow. Sometimes this specimen can be taken with a bronchoscope. This is a narrow tube which can be inserted into the trachea, which carries air from the throat, and into the larger bronchi, branchlike tubes leading to the main air sacs of the lungs. The surgeon can then examine parts of the lung and bronchi. When the tumor is found, a forceps device is inserted through the bronchoscope which allows a surgeon to snip out a section of the tissue for study.

But Montague's X ray had shown a shadow in the outer edge of one of the air sacs, where the bronchoscope couldn't reach. Surgery was the only answer.

It was December 15. "I don't see any need to spoil your Christmas," the surgeon said gently. "Why don't you come into the hospital right after the New Year?"

A little more than twenty years ago, Montague's operation would have been considered almost impossible. Then a brilliant surgeon took a calculated risk. As a fellow physician lay on the table, the surgeon removed an entire lung. The patient still practices.

As Warner Montague was wheeled into surgery, the operation, called a pneumonectomy, was a daily occurrence. The chest was opened, and the cancer came into view. The only safe course for Montague was excision of the entire lung. Then the chest cavity was filled with air to keep it from collapsing or being filled by fluids.

Warner Montague still maintains his own insurance brokerage. Too much activity may make him a little short of breath, but he is not an invalid. He is well.

Of the 30,000 Americans who develop lung cancer yearly, not more than 1500 are still living after five years. If every American over 45 had a chest X ray taken once a year, thousands more could be saved. For the cough is often the only warning, and so often it is blamed on something else—smoking, a cold, allergies or bad weather. "A cough that lasts more than three weeks," experts say, "should mean a call on your doctor."

Many cancers never provoke a cough until it is too late. Only the shadow on the X-ray film can tell of the malignancy in time. The efficacy of this is indicated by the fact that in many cities, free tuberculosis X rays turn up more cancer than tuberculosis.

With the heavy flavor of Austria-Hungary in her speech, Mrs. Anthony Clemente, a buoyantly animated woman of 61, tells the story of a spring day. "I work in my garden, hoe and dig. Suddenly I fall down. I faint.

The human being that can learn no more has parted with the only priceless possession in the human inheritance. The men, women or nations that harden in their mold, get set in their ways, crystallize their opinions and beliefs, and swear by and live according to their routine habits—such men, women or nations are old; senile decay is at hand, and in them creative evolution has ceased to function.

From then I notice a pain in my stomach, like an ache—right here," she says, clasping an area below her ribs. "It comes and goes," she adds. "Always before I am hungry. Now I don't care so much for food, don't want to eat. I lose weight."

Neighbors and friends urged Mrs. Clemente to see a doctor, and finally she went, timidly, to a small clinic. Mrs. Clemente did not care much for doctors.

"The doctor took an X ray," she continues. "But he don't show it to me. Then he come to the house. 'When your husband come home, Mrs. Clemente,' he say, 'tell him stop by my office.'

"My husband go to the doctor, but he won't tell me anything. He look very upset. All night he walk up and down, smoke cigarettes. Next morning he say, 'Buy yourself nice clothes, take a trip and see your friends in Detroit.' Then I get afraid. I make him tell me."

The doctor had told Mr. Clemente that his wife had cancer of the stomach, an advanced case, that immediate surgery was essential. But Mr. Clemente, certain his wife would die, was determined simply to make her last days as happy as possible.

"Meanwhile I get bad pains," says Mrs. Clemente. (Stomach-cancer pains are often compared to ulcer pains in intensity.) "I lose ten pounds. I have bad indigestion. I cry a lot. But I no want to die in hospital."

The Clemente home was besieged by friends and relatives, some advocates, some opponents of surgery. "I get so weak, I can't carry a head of lettuce. I stay in bed a lot. Finally I get mad and go to the specialist the doctor recommend."

The specialist took more X rays, and showed these to Mrs. Clemente. "I was shaking all over. I see black shadow, like the hand of death. I remember all my life. 'Mrs. Clemente,' the doctor say, 'we do this operation every day.'

"'And they all get well?' I ask him.

"'Now, Mrs. Clemente,' he say, 'that's up to God.'

"In the hospital I fall asleep, and I wake up, and it is all over. There is pain the first day, and then I feel fine. Except they won't let me eat, and I'm so hungry!"

Mrs. Clemente was fed intravenously for twelve days. Excess fluids were siphoned away. "They leave me only a little stomach, but I'm as hungry as if I have a big stomach. After twelve days they let me eat. From then I eat everything. I feel fine, except I eat strawberry shortcake too soon, and get pains."

Today, Elizabeth Clemente has only one disability remaining from her battle with cancer. She must lie down for fifteen minutes after eating.

"One thing I learn, which I tell many people," she says. "Don't be afraid of operations. Operations are to save lives."

Experts say that only 5 to 6 per cent of those who develop stomach cancer survive. The tragic reason is time. It is almost unbelievable, but the average stomach-cancer patient has had his symptoms eleven months before he ever sees a doctor!

Unfortunately, these symptoms are subtle. They are continuing indigestion, bloatedness, mild nausea, shortness of breath after exertion, vomiting, hunger disappearing after the first few bites of food, ulcerous pain, excessive belching, heartburn. Too often they are so gradual as to be unnoticed. These occur in varying combinations.

"But," says one surgeon, "how anyone can put up with these things for nearly a year, without suspicion, without being anxious for relief, I simply cannot understand. Such complaints, singly or in combination, which persist over three weeks should send any reasonable person to his doctor. They are probably not cancer. But they probably do indicate some illness which should be relieved."

In one hospital, a study was made of patients who reported stomach-cancer symptoms, in the first few months: 64 per cent—some twelve times the average—were alive and well five years later.

In these seven cases may be seen the reasons why the American Cancer Society speaks so urgently of time. This is why you hear their "seven danger signals" repeated again and again and again. For these seven cases can and should be multiplied by thousands. Each was saved by heeding the warning contained in one of the following simple lines. Someday they may save your life.

Unusual bleeding or discharge.
A lump or thickening in the breast or elsewhere.
A sore that does not heal.
Persistent change in bowel or bladder habits.
Persistent hoarseness or cough.
Persistent indigestion or difficulty in swallowing.
Change in a wart or mole. END

ROYAL DRESSMAKING

bsolutely Edwardian," said one. "But they re always very polite to us."

A measure of how cautious they all have to e when trying to advise the Queen are the erms in which they must couch any sugges- ion. "I would not dream of saying as I might o another customer, 'This hat could look nuch smarter if your hair were cut shorter,'" aid one of her milliners. "All I feel I could ay is, 'I think this hat will look perfect when Your Majesty's hair is a little smoother at he sides.'" Like all the staff, they must call er "Your Majesty" and never, as their friends lo, "Ma'am."

The formality that surrounds a royal client s carried outside the palace into the dress- nakers' salon. If one of the royal customers vishes to see a collection a lady in waiting ings up to say that Her Royal Highness Princess Margaret or Her Majesty the Queen Mother would like to see the collection that fternoon. Recently a royal dressmaker re- eived the rather touching message that the Queen had seen his collection on television at he palace and it looked so nice she would like o come along and see it for herself.

Mr. Hartnell himself changes into the most ormal British attire, a black cutaway jacket, triped black-and-gray trousers. Fresh flowers or the salon are speeded round. The model girls have their hair specially done if there's ime. All the dresses in the collection are spruced up and pressed, fresh gloves laid out.

One of the saleswomen is stationed at the op of the pale-gray-carpeted stairs leading to he salon from the black-and-silver doorway n Bruton Street. She is there to tip off clients who may not know the form when royalty s about. "Don't speak to her unless she speaks to you. Call her 'Ma'am' [pronounced "Mam"] and not 'Your Majesty.' Curtsy if you pass by her."

The entire staff stand throughout the show- ing, and Mr. Hartnell stands behind the royal chair which is of course grander, and more comfortable, than the ordinary slender gilt salon chairs.

The Queen chooses from the collection for her private life, but she always asks who else has ordered the dress. If it is a businesswoman or wealthy provincial housewife, she will go ahead and have the dress for herself. If it is someone in her own circle, she will not take it. Once she has bought the dress, it is withdrawn from the collection, which is often a sacrifice by the designer, since the chances are that the model she likes is the kind of simple little number that the designer could sell a hundred times over.

So the answer to the question "Can an ordinary customer buy the same dress that the Queen wears in private life?" is yes—so long as it is certain that she will never come face to face with her. But she can never have the same dress the Queen or any of her family wears on a public occasion.

Nothing can prevent the royal dresses' being copied after they have been worn in public except to make them, by sheer weight of embroidery, uncopiable.

Several years ago when the young Queen was to attend a royal film première at the Empire Leicester Square, and meet a group of glittering Hollywood stars, she said, "I want a dress to make me look different." The dress which she wore that night was indeed different—a startling magpie affair of black satin with a panel of white satin down the front. It had one grave fault, however. Within a few days copies were on sale at $30 in the store next door to the cinema where the Queen had worn the original.

With hats there is less stuffiness. Recently Princess Margaret has been pictured wearing the same hat as Vivian Leigh, made by the same milliner. Miss Leigh's was navy blue and white, the Princess' was pale blue and white. And the Princess wore hers a month after the actress had been pictured in her version. "The Princess does not mind at all," said her milliner. "She thinks it is rather a joke. And anyway, no one could mind having the same hat as such a beautiful woman as Miss Leigh." Actually Miss Leigh ordered her hat at the beginning of the season and the Princess did not order hers until later.

Dresses for public or state appearances are more strictly watched. The lady in waiting rings up the dressmaker to say that Her Majesty has graciously commanded sketches for clothes for such-and-such a tour. He is told precisely what kind of dresses are wanted—summer dresses, evening dresses or cocktail dresses—and given the information about climate and background. The sketches he sends later to the palace may not be more than vague likenesses; it would be more than his job is worth to suggest in the drawings that the Queen Mother is a trifle stout and that Margaret is pocket-sized. Or that the Queen has a deep bosom—even though he knows that she knows.

Fantastic secrecy must be preserved about royal prices (but they pay the current prices, around $600 for an embroidered evening gown), about royal preferences and royal remarks.

The bitter fact for those who dress the royal ladies is that they are forbidden to make one iota of publicity out of it. If they receive the royal warrant, which is not given until the supplier has provided at least three years' regular service, they must sign a document which yearly grows more stringent. This forbids them to make any statements to the press, to use the Royal Crown on anything but a label, writing paper, shopwindow or van, or to write a book revealing any information whatever.

Norman Hartnell, the dressmaker, kept to this pledge rigidly for years. Then he wrote his memoirs, Silver and Gold, but he shrewdly decided to send the manuscript to the royal family, asking their permission to publish it. After careful royal scrutiny Hartnell was given this permission.

Currently the royal shoemaker, Edward Rayne, is in hot water. Every time he is described by the press as the man who makes the Queen's shoes he is liable to be carpeted by the Queen's comptroller, Gen. Sir. Frederick Browning, or by the Royal Warrant Holders' Association. Now he can neither confirm nor deny publicly what has been public knowledge for years: the fact that he makes shoes for the Queen, Princess Margaret and the Queen Mother, just as he did for old Queen Mary.

The present rumpus blew up because he stamped in gold inside his shoes the coveted royal crest with the valued words "By Appointment" beneath. The delicate question is whether this is a contravention of the terms of the royal warrant, whether in fact it constitutes making publicity out of his royal clients, and whether the inner sole where the crest is stamped is a label. Mr. Rayne contends that it is.

The core of most criticism directed against royal dressmakers is that they have not made the British royal family elegant, in the way that the Belgian Princesse de Rethy is elegant. But the answer is simply that many of the styles which are fashionable today are impossible for British royalty.

"The press are always criticizing me for my peep-toe shoes," said the Queen, "but I'd like to see them stand all day in high-heeled court shoes."

Slim skirts suit her, as her dressmakers were quick to see. Her hips are a slender thirty-five inches and she has lovely long legs. Both Hardy Amies and Norman Hartnell include slim-skirted dresses in the sketches they send to the palace for her to see. Only once has she succumbed to a straight-skirted evening dress. It was a form-fitting sheath in thick creamy lace which knocked onlookers sideways when she wore it in South Africa. "I don't know how Hardy got her to wear it," said a rival dressmaker enviously. "She has never looked better."

But the Queen has said that she will never again wear a dress with a straight skirt for a public occasion. "People should just try getting into and out of cars in tight skirts in front of all those photographers," she said. Nor will she wear straight skirts during the day: "It means too much tugging of skirts when I sit on a platform," she explained.

Even a full skirt can present a problem of dignity if it is worn on a windy day. "The Queen in Trouble" screamed the London Daily Sketch, showing her in a pretty, printed dress with a full skirt, photographed at Cowdray Park when Philip was playing polo. The picture was snapped just at the moment when the wind lifted the skirt an inch or two. The Queen put out her hand to keep it in place, an everyday incident for an ordinary girl but material for headlines when it happened to Her Majesty. One inch of frilly petticoat was wired all over the world because it belonged to Princess Margaret, standing on the breezy tarmac during her tour of the West Indies.

The Queen's favorite style of coat is a redingote, buttoning down the center of the front. Impossible for royalty is the elegance of a wrap-over coat or clutch handbag, for the hand that grasps the handbag or coat must be at liberty to shake a hundred hands, and to accept a bouquet.

The fashions for which the family are most severely criticized invariably have sound reasoning behind them. The wrist watch which the Queen wears outside her glove reminds her that punctuality is the politeness of kings; the white gloves ensure that the restrained queenly wave from a hurrying car can be seen by thousands; the eternal strap handbags she carries day and evening leave her hands free; the little hats which are her uniform are chosen in recognition of the fact that many people travel miles to catch a glimpse of her face and she would not be doing her part of the job if she presented them with only a brim.

The royal milliners have the difficult task of meeting these special demands of their client without losing sight of elegance. When Danish-born Aage Thaarup goes to the palace with between four and ten shapes in his brown-and-white hatboxes, he knows that chic alone will never sell a hat. "I am famous for the fit of my hats," he says when asked to explain the continued royal patronage. "My hats always stay on." A special wire grip inside the crown coils round the royal head and forms twin loops each side to cling to the temples. Thus when the Queen, wearing a large white hat, drove down the course at Ascot in an open carriage on a blowy day, she was the only woman on the course who never once had to raise a hand to hold on her hat.

Even Princess Anne at the age of six has learned the inviolable royal rule that hats must never blow off. Her little bonnet, wreathed with small flowers, was made an inch deeper in the crown than is currently fashionable among her aristocratic little friends.

It goes without saying that all royal clothes must be free of zip, slip and button trouble. At the Queen's wedding two sewing women were stationed in the Abbey in case her dress needed running repairs. At the Coronation it was decided not to use a zip fastener for the shift she had to discard during the ceremony. Tiny buttons and loops were used instead.

In spite of all precautions there have been two occasions when royal dresses have caused embarrassment. The probing TV eye once caught Princess Margaret at a ball wearing a topless evening dress, leaning forward, and displaying a sensational amount of cleavage for any girl—let alone a British princess. The startling pictures were spread all over the British press next morning. The weekly Woman's Sunday Mirror ran a feature "Are the Princess' Dresses Too Daring?" And the

"Your call makes it a real birthday, Mother"

It's good to be remembered on your own special day. And when someone you miss telephones from out of town, the day really seems complete.

Matter of fact, every birthday call is a two-way greeting. Not only do you send your greetings and your love in the warmest possible way. You share, too, in the fun and happiness of the day.

Why not keep a list near the telephone so you won't forget the birthday calls you want to make?

next time the curvaceous little Princess wore that dress it was modestly secured with two shoulder straps.

The Queen, a hundred times less interested in fashion and a hundred times more careful in her choice, has misjudged only once. The photographers, watching her get out of her car after a long journey, were quick to note that her skirt had creased like a concertina. Next day came the headlines proclaiming for all to see: "The Crumpled Queen."

They wear very little black in public. However much the designers would like to show off the fabulous pink-and-white royal complexions, black is not on the cards. Never forgotten is the day when the Parisian-educated Duchess of Kent made her first public appearance in Britain. She wore one of her chic little black dresses from Paris, and the crowd were bitterly disappointed. "She looks just like one of us," was their summing up.

And black, for all its elegance, can be an intimation of bad news. One designer told us how he once designed an exquisite black velvet dress for the Queen Mother. "It is beautiful," she said. "But the King is so ill I feel that the country might take it as an indication if I wore black."

Nevertheless, both the Queen and Princess Margaret have short black dinner dresses which they wear for private theater or dinner parties with their friends. "I'd love to wear more black," the Princess confided to one of her dressmakers. "I just feel I shouldn't."

They continue to wear their famous pastel-colored clothes, chiefly because they want to create a cheering and sympathetic effect and because they must be seen easily in a milling crowd. The wisdom of this is demonstrated at every Buckingham Palace garden party. Five thousand guests crowd the lawns behind the palace, yet it is the two tiniest figures which are seen best. In the midst of the crowd the little Queen and the pocket Princess, each clothed from top to toe in some delicate pastel shade, stand out from the crowd like the first two primroses in a wood.

The three main royal ladies treat the business of dressing from different and individual standpoints. The Queen Mother, regarded by many as the best dressed, is also the most professional. One milliner tells how she called at the salon with a sheaf of newspaper photographs of herself. "Look at these," she expostulated. "I look absolutely frightful—I must have hats that photograph well." Then she sat down and went through the lot, hatpin by hatpin.

Princess Margaret adores clothes. If she is with her sister when a new batch of sketches arrives she will dive into them, discussing each dress eagerly, making suggestions. The Queen will merely smile and make some pleasant remark:

"Thank you, they look very nice."

In the last eighteen months the Princess has tried out three new hair styles—an Empress Josephine bun, a short cut, and the wide bouffant style. She's had a stab at the bucket hat, worn off the face according to royal custom. She studies all the fashion magazines. And she thoroughly enjoys the flattering comments from the section of the press who call her a "fashion leader."

But, "If the Queen had her own way," said one of the royal warrant holders a trifle wistfully, "she would never move out of a tweed suit and old country shoes." At race meetings she wears a shapeless camel coat and a head scarf, and looks her happiest.

She takes only a cool, professional interest in clothes, knowing that dressing is part of the job she takes so seriously. Not even her most devoted admirers pretend that she is a fashion plate, nor does she want to be. This is not only because she knows that extreme elegance can have a paralyzing effect; it's because she feels a personal limitation and acute shyness too. On a recent visit her milliner produced, with a flourish, his masterpiece—a chic little Edwardian boater to be worn tipped over the eyes. "I love it," said the Queen. "But," she added, "it's much too smart for me."

There are countless examples of deliberately flattening out a chic fashion to suit her gentle, unsophisticated personality. The elegant Parisian white straw hat designed by Claude St. Cyr to be worn at Ascot had a dashing, dipping brim. The Queen ordered it to be made with the brim straightened so that it looked like a schoolgirl's summer straw. The magnificent stomacher of diamonds left her by Queen Mary so inspired one of her dressmakers that he designed a special gown of spinach-green velvet to show it off. The queen confessed she had had the piece cut up; all she had left were two prosaic small clips.

With all this, Elizabeth and Margaret and their mother have scored some notable successes. Today even Christian Dior speaks nostalgically of the British Queen's all-white wardrobe which stunned Paris.

When Queen Elizabeth follows a glittering assembly of film stars, diplomats' wives, millionairesses, or is the star figure in a pageant, she can be relied upon to create the smash hit of the evening.

Her fabulous gown will be only a background for the jewels which are too rare to be priced, too many to be elegant. She will wear a diamond tiara with delicate, jagged edge given her by Queen Mary, the necklace and drop earrings of sapphires and diamonds or emeralds and diamonds given her as a wedding present by her father, on one wrist the thin diamond bracelet given to her by Philip and on the other the wide diamond bracelet inherited from her grandmother and also a diamond wrist watch. Across her bosom is the Garter sash, pinned near the waist with its vast star and with an additional diamond drop brooch on the shoulder, or the two miniatures of her father and grandfather which are surrounded with diamonds and pinned with pale blue bows.

The success and the failure of royal dressing are summed up in the two remarks most often overheard about her. "I saw a picture of the Queen," you can hear her loyal subjects remark, "and I thought her hat looked a sight."

That's her failure.

But at other times they say, "I saw the Queen. And she looked beautiful." That's her success. END

THE WIDOW

By MARION LINEAWEAVER

After your soul is done to death,
Salvage begins.
Whether you will or no, your breath
Is yet alive. It spins
A lifeline for you on the waves of gloom
That lap the doorway of an unshared room.

Under your shroudlike mourning dress
The brazen sun
Moves on a still responsive breast,
Burning it brown,
And your hands that you wrung weakly, over and over,
Dip like birds in the claret-purple clover.

You pull the flowers and taste their wine
With fervent sips,
And walk the earth, your anodyne,
With red, thirsty lips.
Only at night, cold in a narrow bed,
You know which one of you is really dead.

Ann Head

ANN HEAD writes that she is pleased to be a Southerner and a resident of Beaufort, South Carolina, "... a town of some nine thousand inhabitants situated on an island and a stone's throw from the ocean. My two daughters (aged fifteen and two) and the dog and I occupy a small white house on a high bluff overlooking the Beaufort River. I was born here, as was my father before me, and we love it."

Like many writers, she admits that writing is a painful business. "I rent a minute cottage in the town (it used to be the kitchen to the big house in whose garden it sits) where I reluctantly come every day, reluctantly close the door and write." David's New Girl (page 62) is her first full-length novel, but in the last dozen years she has sold scores of short stories and novelettes in this country and abroad.

Between her writing and her children she finds time for little else, so she says, "I have resigned myself to being pretty much of a drudge. After all, you can't have everything, though sometimes I feel that I do."

Ruth Matthews

"As a family scout for the How America Lives series," says RUTH MATTHEWS, "I've earned my membership in the airlines' 100,000 Mile Club—probably chalked up more mileage than that since starting the work fifteen years ago." Born in Sioux City, Iowa, of pioneering ancestors, Ruth's first best friend was a pony. Perhaps it was then that she developed a taste for going places. "I've flown Piper Cubs over deserts and mountains," she says, "and ridden jeeps and boats and horses on the job." After graduation from Goucher College, she was a reporter for the old Public Ledger in Philadelphia, before moving on to the JOURNAL's New York office. "The U.S.A. is my beat," Ruth says, "and I love it."

Joseph Bowler, Jr.

JOE BOWLER decided to be an illustrator while he was still in high school, served a two-year apprenticeship doing spot drawings for detective stories, and in 1948 joined the staff of Charles E. Cooper, Inc. Since his first magazine illustration appeared in 1950, he has illustrated a number of JOURNAL stories—with emphasis on youth, color and gaiety. (See pages 62—65.) He has also done recruiting posters for the Air Force, and last spring spent some time in Europe making sketches for a permanent collection at the Air Force Academy in Colorado Springs. Mr. Bowler lives in New York with his wife Marilyn (who paints, sculpts and frequently models for him) and two small daughters, Jolyn and Brynne. On vacations, the Bowlers are happiest hunting and fishing in Northern Ontario.

Letter to Myself at Sixty, at Seventy and Especially at Eighty

Dear Myself: It's entirely possible that we might get out of touch with each other in the years ahead. I've thought a lot about you and, getting older, hoping we could figure out a way before it's too late to turn the pyramid of years into a friend instead of the destructive enemy that it seems to be to many people. Too many people.

Bankers, budgeteers and business always have a Plan. How's this for a plan?

Cook something new every day.

Even if it is only a new way to put cheese on a cracker, the search for a never-before will stimulate your imagination as well as palate. It doesn't do to let meals for one get dull.

Learn something new every day.

There are lots of words in that dictionary which need exploring. Or why not settle once and for all the relative positions of Burma, India and Pakistan? A globe right beside your chair provides endless material. So do travel folders. That slip in your memory showing? Why not learn a Shakespeare sonnet with your second cup of coffee?

Love someone new every day.

Love given to ever smaller and smaller circles can be a burdensome thing, to both the loved ones and the giver of love. (The final and smallest circle contains only oneself.) A child's face in a cart in the supermarket or the sorrowing face of a woman standing beside you at a bus stop can receive love and enrich you in the giving of your attention. If the supermarket and bus stops no longer attract you, there are lots of new people in books to love.

Listen to a new voice every day.

If it can't be a new voice, it could be a sound which you have never heard. You will see at once that I am trying to trick you here. The listening habit is a pretty thing in the young, but especially becoming to those not so young.

Keep a notebook in which you record at night success or failure in the day's venture. You will find yourself emptying hours, rather than trying vainly to fill them.

And remember you are not alone. If you are working on the plan, I'll be right there with you.

NOTE TO OUR READERS

We're tired of hearing about marriages that don't work, about the ever-rising divorce rate, about just plain maladjustment.

The JOURNAL would like to hear some talk from people who are happily married in this year of 1957.

We are inviting any of our readers who wish to write us a letter of between 300 and 500 words on the subject "Why I Love My Husband (or Wife)." We won't pretend that it will be an easy letter to write. For we're not asking for a picture of an "ideal" or "dream" wife, or for a picture of the "perfect mate." Nor are we asking for a definition of love.

What we do want is a highly personal, candid picture of a human being who is lovable because he or she is alive, alive in a way that is special and meaningful to his mate. When you've finished, we'd like one last paragraph (for we truly don't want eulogies)—and that can be titled: What I'd Change in My Husband (or Wife)!

Letters must be typewritten—not more than 500 words. The Editors of the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL reserve the right to decide whether to publish or not, and for those accepted will pay $350. Readers who wish their letters returned should be sure to enclose their addresses and return postage.

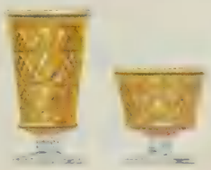
What a Peanut Butter! So nourishing a sandwich equals a square meal!

BIG TOP

It's naturally fortified!

NUTRITIONISTS AGREE: One Big Top sandwich has as much basic nourishment—proteins, fats, carbohydrates, food energy—as this meal of lamb chop, potato, green beans.



We're not suggesting that you give up hot dishes and serve Big Top sandwiches for every meal. But when you want a quick, delicious lunch or snack, it's good to know: Big Top peanut butter is naturally fortified—a powerhouse of nourishment. Just one sandwich (1½ ounces of Big Top) has as much basic food value as the meal above, with normal portions shown. All this plus important vitamins and minerals.

Enjoy creamy, easy-spreading Big Top between two slices of bread—a glass of milk—fresh fruit. Mmm, what a lunch!

If you've been taking aspirin for colds...remember–

BUFFERIN®

1. Medical science knows that a pain reliever must go through the stomach and into the blood stream to relieve pain.

2. Bufferin combines aspirin with two antacid ingredients. These speed the pain reliever out of the stomach and into the blood stream twice as fast as aspirin. So . . .

3. Bufferin acts twice as fast as aspirin to relieve pain. And it won't upset your stomach as aspirin often does.

IF YOU SUFFER FROM PAIN OF ARTHRITIS OR RHEUMATISM, ASK YOUR PHYSICIAN ABOUT BUFFERIN

✔ acts twice as fast as aspirin to relieve cold miseries and headaches!

✔ won't upset your stomach
as aspirin often does!

Medical research shows that most cold sufferers stop taking pain relievers before getting completely rid of a cold.

Why? Many people find that ordinary pain relievers, taken over prolonged periods of time, cause upset stomach.

That's why you need Bufferin. It acts twice as fast as aspirin, yet is so gentle and safe you can take it over prolonged periods without fear of upset stomach.

It means this—from the first sniffle of a cold, right through until the last cough, you can count on Bufferin for fast, wonderful relief.

P. S. Bufferin acts twice as fast as aspirin to relieve headaches and other pains, too! No wonder people by the millions are switching to Bufferin.

Cheer's Blue-Magic whitener makes the difference . . . and only Cheer has it!

Here's why Mrs. Ream could see the difference. Only Cheer has the Blue-Magic whitener—a special ingredient that gets clothes really white.

Why is whiteness important? Because if your white things are really white, you know that your whole wash is good and clean. And Cheer washes clothes amazingly white, even whiter than they were the day you bought them.

Try blue Cheer. Make the Cheer window test, as Mrs. Ream did, and see the difference yourself.

I LIKE AMERICANS

ISFAHAN, IRAN

On this long trip with my husband and my secretary to out-of-the-way parts of the earth—if there are any "out-of-the-way" parts of the earth any more—I have discovered how much I like my fellow countrymen. I like Americans for their enthusiasm, their capacity to enjoy themselves and for their humor.

Today one meets Americans traveling around the world for no other reason than to have seen the world. Most of them are elderly and retired—for who during his working life can take a year, or half a year, for extended travel? And they amaze me. After sixty-five one expects to be short of breath and stiff of limb. But I have seen rosy-faced old parties clambering over the Acropolis in Athens, rising at dawn to see the sun rise on the Taj Mahal and visiting it again in moonlight, climbing the eighty steep steps to the top pavilion of the fabulous deserted palace of Fatehpur Sikri in India, and exchanging advice about the only hotel in Isfahan.

"Ask for Room Twenty-five. As far as we know, it's the only room with a bath. And don't be afraid of the hot-water geyser. It doesn't explode, although you'll think it will. The kerosene heater lets off fumes—I wouldn't let it burn all night." And (confidentially), "The toilet's not the sit-down but the stand-up or squat kind—you know, a hole in the floor. But you'll be comfortable enough, and Isfahan is fabulous, though Persepolis, if you are going to be in Iran, is even more wonderful." And (wistfully), "I only wish we could get to China, even if it is Red."

These elderly men and women, still possessing the capacity for wonder which is usually God's gift only to the child, move me inexpressibly. They do not pretend to be "much traveled." They are not ashamed to ask the most simple questions. They eat "outlandish" foods with native curiosity, if not exactly pleasure, and they make friends of total strangers in the most extraordinary way. Back in Omaha or Los Angeles they may—just as I do—bore their friends with their slides and stories, but meanwhile they are having an enriching and rejuvenating experience.

Of course Americans are not unique in all this, but it seems to me that other travelers are more afraid to "give themselves away," to reveal their innocence or ignorance. Americans seem to know that only the admittedly ignorant ever learn. "I've spent forty-five years in the oil business"—or in mail-order merchandising or what not—"but now I want to know more. Tell me all you can." They are not cocksure. They do not think America invented everything. This desire to learn, to acquire information of all sorts, is a wonderful American characteristic. It is not going to make our travelers experts, but it certainly opens shutters in their minds.

I like Americans because of their capacity to dedicate themselves to the problems of men and women in unfamiliar places. We are an encouraging people and I have seen this over and over. Many of the countries we have visited, for instance, have village-development programs based on self-help. The United States is helping to finance these programs and Americans are working with the local officials. Many Americans have gone, I believe, from the extension service of the Department of Agriculture. The Ford Foundation is helping to conduct fifteen pilot experiments in India. It is a program of self-help of the type we at home call "Democracy in Action."

Under such a program the whole of India, with its more than half a million villages, is organized—or being organized—into development units, each embracing a group of contiguous villages. The leaders must themselves be villagers, and not educated too far above the rest. The villagers come together to plan their projects and almost invariably the first thing they want is a school. But they themselves must build it, at least 25 per cent of the cost coming from their own means.

One could correctly ask, "Out of what means?" in countries where average incomes vary from $25 to $60 a year. But the lesson the villagers are learning is that the poorest of the poor has something to contribute to his community. He has hands and a back. He has a donkey or bullock cart. And in every village there is a relatively well-to-do man.

In China, which has village problems similar to those of the whole Middle East and Asia, the "rich landowner" would be expropriated or forced to relinquish his land under threat of imprisonment. But the Indian and other non-Communist governments do not believe in force or uncompensated expropriation. Instead they believe in the universal desire of the man of property who is also a leader to be loved and respected by his fellow men; in short, in the power of communal conscience. So almost invariably the well-to-do landowner comes forward, offering land for the school in countries where land is a little more precious than rubies.

Such universal participation levels class and caste differences, which are still the curse of India. The school that all have built is open to all. As education is a great lifter-up, it is also a great leveler—a leveler upward.

I like Americans because they have a passion for practical uplift, not in terms of preaching but of doing. They respond to the challenge of enormous problems and they believe that none is, in the long run, insoluble. Their idealism is tempered by skepticism without being quenched by the possibility of failure.

"Do you think these people are really going to be able to accomplish all they're attempting?" How often have I asked that question and in how many countries.

Usually the reply is, "I doubt it—but they don't need to. All they need is enough success to realize that CONTINUED ON PAGE 49

Getting started on breast feeding

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

DR. SPOCK

"Breast feeding is natural. On general principle, it's safer to do things the natural way unless you're absolutely sure you have a better way."

SUZANNE SZASZ

"The mother's feeling that she is giving her baby something real, something that no one else can give him, is good for her and good for her relationship with her baby."

I want to talk about factors in the day-to-day management of breast feeding which make for success or lack of it, first in the hospital and later when the mother and the baby are at home.

Some of the conscious and unconscious attitudes which can make a woman decide, during pregnancy, that she does not want to nurse her baby or which leave her in doubt were discussed in a previous article. There is the fear of being tied down, which has a realistic basis in one case and not in another; the fear that nursing will take too much out of her, which is rarely true physically but may be true emotionally. Some women shrink from nursing because it seems too animal-like, and others because it's embarrassing. Such objections occasionally lessen during a pregnancy and give place to a positive desire to nurse. When a mother does want to breast-feed her baby, it doesn't necessarily mean that she has no doubts at all. To the degree that they carry over into the nursing period, they may intensify other difficulties she is having with feeding.

The woman who wants to nurse has to take into account, also, the attitudes of her relatives and friends. Some of them will be a great help with their approval and encouragement. But it's wise for the mother to know that there may be others who will try to make her feel she is doing something peculiar, or that nursing is just too difficult.

I don't think breast feeding need be difficult—it's easier than bottle feeding when it goes well—but there are certain aspects of it that make it seem more difficult. For instance, a mother can't tell exactly how much the baby is getting unless she weighs him carefully before and after each feeding, which is a laborious business, and which is usually quite unnecessary and undesirable. If the mother does get the figures, they are often not reassuring because in the early weeks the amounts are apt to vary a lot. The smaller amounts impress the mother more than the larger amounts. (Even older babies have been found to vary as much as from three ounces at one feeding to ten ounces at another, and still be quite satisfied.)

If a mother decides one day that her baby has not received enough from her breast, there is of course no way to get more breast milk quickly, the way she could get more formula. Even when there is no sign of insufficiency, an uncertain mother may still be worried by the fact that she has no reserve to fall back on.

These various doubts and apparent difficulties may add up to what looks like quite a mountain to young mothers. Now some of those who nurse are self-confident women who are doing it as a matter of course. Probably their mothers successfully nursed them, so they take it for granted that it's the natural and the easy thing to do. This attitude is actually the most helpful factor in nursing. But others aren't blessed with that degree of assurance. Often it is the individuals who are most idealistic and conscientious who lack self-confidence underneath. They have been convinced of the psychological importance of breast feeding to the baby and they may have come to think that their ability to nurse will be a test of whether they are good mothers. It is these mothers, who deserve the best breaks, who are apt to be bothered most by doubts about their own ability and about the baby's satisfaction.

Now let's turn to some specific problems of the hospital period. The milk usually comes in two to four days after birth, in some cases suddenly, in others gradually. Just about this time the baby becomes more restless and hungry, perhaps waking as often as ten times in the twenty-four hours for a few days. In previous decades when mothers stayed in the hospital for nearly two weeks it was impossible to match this frequent hunger with the hospital's strict four-hour schedule. Some babies fussed a lot, breasts were insufficiently stimulated, and breast feeding was often called off as a failure before the baby got home. Nowadays a baby and his mother are home in plenty of time to work out a schedule of their own that provides enough feedings to satisfy the baby and to stimulate the breasts. Then as the supply becomes established, within a few days, they can lengthen out to something like a four-hour interval. In the hospitals which have "rooming in" the schedule can be adapted to the baby's hunger right from the start.

At Yale Medical School three doctors—George Barnes, Anton Lethin, Edith Jackson—and a nurse—Nilda Shea—made a careful study of the difficulties encountered at the beginning of breast feeding. They suggest that the mother find the position that's most comfortable for her—lying on her side in bed, or sitting up in bed or straight chair or rocking chair, with support under her arms. They point out that if the breasts become engorged and hard in the areolar (dark-skinned) region, the baby may not be able to take the entire areolar region into his mouth as he should. Instead he chews on the nipple, which is painful to the mother and may cause cracking. The answer is manual expression of some of the milk in the sinuses behind the areola, until it is soft enough to be drawn into the baby's mouth. It helps, too, if the mother flattens the areolar region between her thumb and finger to be sure the baby gets it all the way in. Flat or retracted nipples call for the same flattening of the areola and for manual expression if there is any engorgement. It's wise to limit nursing to five minutes on each breast for the first few days after birth, to give the nipples a chance to become tougher and to prevent cracking. It's good for the mother to know that in the first few days she may feel sharp twinges of pain in the nipple and in the healing uterus for a minute after the baby takes hold, but that after a week nursing should be comfortable if the nipples are healthy.

These investigators also call attention to the very different manner of nursing of different babies. The eager beaver knows how to get what he wants from the start. The only problems are the initial pain in the nipple and the uterus the first week, and the prevention of cracked nipples. The excitable baby is eager, overactive but easily frustrated. If he loses the nipple and screams, he should be well quieted before a second try. The procrastinator shows no interest for several days until the milk comes in. Prodding him does no good, it only makes him more balky. The mouther has to mouth the nipple, taste the milk, smack his lips before going to work. Prodding makes him furious. The rester is a stop-and-go nurser. He usually does all right if he is allowed extra time.

I'd like to mention a few more factors. An encouraging attitude on the part of the doctor is a big help. Even more important is a nurse who is interested, helpful, gentle and friendly.

A baby is much more likely to work hard at the breast if he isn't regularly given formula during the time when breast feeding is being established. A bottle is easier for most babies to take and makes them lazy about the breast. To be well satisfied with formula at the end of each feeding also reduces his hungriness for the breast at the next feeding. However, there are times, especially when ▪ baby becomes desperately hungry long before he can be put to breast, when a formula or at least sugar water has to be given. Sugar water stays in the stomach a much shorter time and so is less likely to take away appetite for the next breast feeding.

If ▪ mother wants to breast-feed she has a good chance of overcoming any problems that arise in the hospital. It may take more perseverance to solve difficulties that come later when she and the baby are at home. It's important for her to know that the milk supply is apt to fall off for a day or so after going home, probably due to the tension and fatigue she experiences. This can usually be solved with more frequent nursing, on both breasts, for a couple of days.

Generally speaking, the milk supply tends to become more stabilized from feeding to feeding as the days and weeks go by, and it will also keep increasing as the baby grows and needs more. It's the baby's demands, expressed in the completeness with which he empties the breast and the frequency with which he nurses, that determine the amount of milk the breasts produce. This is important to know, because many mothers have the mistaken idea that each woman's breasts have a certain fixed capacity which may prove insufficient as the baby grows. I have been interested to learn from mothers of twins that at least as large a proportion of them are able to nurse both babies satisfactorily as the proportion of mothers of single babies. This proves so clearly that it isn't any inherent limitation of the breasts that causes failure in breast feeding. What is it, then?

Friendship is immeasurably better than kindness. CICERO

Sooner or later a majority of new babies, whether on breast or bottle, run into spells of fretfulness. In one case it may be an attack of colic, or what I call irritable crying. It may be some other mild kind of indigestion. It may possibly be hunger, either because the baby's appetite has taken a spurt or because the mother has become slightly overtired or tense. Whatever the cause really is, the first thought of the nursing mother is that she hasn't supplied enough milk—that she is starving her baby.

Or the baby, like most, develops a mild face rash, or his bowel movements look different from the usual, or he simply fails to gain, during one week, the number of ounces that the mother has come to expect, even though he has seemed quite contented. In any case, the mother is apt to suspect right away that her milk is not agreeing with the baby or that it is insufficient.

The mother who is beginning to worry may notice now that her breasts do not seem so full. She may express a drop of milk and see how thin and blue it looks. The breasts become distinctly full and firm at the time the milk comes in, in response to the intense glandular changes following the delivery. Then in the normal course of events they gradually become softer and less prominent, even though the actual capacity to produce milk is steadily increasing. And breast milk always looks thin, transparent and bluish compared with cow's milk. Actually breast milk does not become thin or inadequate in composition.

At this point the devil which enters the picture is the formula slip which was probably given the mother when she left the hospital, "just in case." The temptation to make up a bottle is terrific. It will make the baby happy again if hunger is what ails him. It will surely relieve the mother's anxiety. So the bottle usually gets made and the baby takes more or less of it. Naturally he'll take some of it if he isn't really hungry, but has colic or some other misery. Colicky babies are well known for the greedy way they go for a nipple again, even when they are stuffed full. They probably confuse colic pains with hunger pains. The mother is relieved to see the baby take some formula and is convinced that hunger was the problem. This of course makes her more ready to provide formula the next time her baby fusses, and it further lowers her confidence in her ability to nurse.

You probably know the sequence of events when a baby begins to get a few extra ounces of formula two or three times a day. If he's on a flexible schedule, he may sleep longer. He's apt to be less hungry for the next feeding. Babies don't seem to have heard about the advantages of breast feeding. Most of them, when they are taking the breast and bottle both, begin to show a preference for bottle—it seems to be easier for them to get the milk out of the bottle. The result of added bottle feedings is that the breasts are emptied less often or less completely or both. These are signals to the breasts to produce less milk. Less breast milk results in lower maternal confidence and more bottles.

He who neglects the present moment throws away all he has. SCHILLER

(At this moment you may want to ask about the relief bottle—does that discourage breast feeding? I think the answer is that when the breast milk supply has become well established—when the amount is sufficient and reliable—it does not discourage the breasts too much to substitute one bottle a day, either regularly or occasionally. It's the few extra ounces of formula added to breast feedings in the early weeks—several times a day—which decrease the breast supply.)

Though most American mothers can't resist the kindly impulse to give a bottle as soon as the baby appears dissatisfied, there are some who hold off for a day or two, despite their anxiety, and allow the baby to nurse more frequently. And yet in lots of cases the baby does not become happy again. Of course the trouble may be colic or irritability, especially if the discomfort is occurring at the same period of the evening or afternoon, and in that case there is no reason why extra nursing should cure it. But even if the fretfulness is due to hunger, the extra stimulation of the breasts may be counteracted by the inhibiting effect of the mother's worrying.

For contrast, let's picture what happens, in those parts of the world where all mothers nurse their babies, when a baby runs into a fretful period because of hunger or some other misery. There a mother doesn't easily lose confidence in her ability to produce milk. She has seen all the other mothers continue to nurse for as many months as they wish to, and it never occurs to her that she can't do the same thing. She blames the fretfulness on the weather or on an evil spirit or on unusual hungriness. In any case, she knows that her baby will be comforted by being put to the breast again, even though she nursed him only a relatively short time ago. If he has any hunger, he will completely empty the breast again. If his hunger continues for a day or two, he will continue to empty the breast more frequently and thoroughly than usual. This excess stimulation is almost certain to cause a distinct increase in the rate with which the breast produces milk in a mother who remains untroubled. As soon as the supply reaches a level that satisfies the baby, the frequency with which he wants to nurse returns to what it had been before the fretful period. It's a beautiful adjustment system.

I've been making this sound too simple, as any mother who has had trouble establishing breast feeding knows. Her questions would be: How do you stop worrying when you're worried? And what can you do, aside from more frequent nursing (which you're probably doing already) when your baby seems to be still hungry? There are no perfect answers, but there are partial answers. The first thing to remember is that the milk supply doesn't suddenly drop to zero. Under unfavorable conditions it merely fails to increase, or decreases very gradually. The second thing to remember is that though failure to get quite enough milk for a few weeks may make a baby unhappy at certain times of day, it won't undermine his health during that short period of time. Of course you should keep closely in touch with the doctor (or the public-health nurse) and follow his advice when your baby is not doing well. But you should realize that the doctor will be influenced by your attitude. If you show that you want to stop nursing, he'll probably agree to it. If you show that you are eager to keep trying, he'll probably help you do that, as long as there are no signs of serious deprivation. With his agreement you can avoid giving a bottle for several more weeks. Sometimes the doctor starts solid foods earlier than usual to help tide a baby over a hungry spell. With the doctor's help you can try to blame Pessimism over the future of the world comes from a confusion between civilization and security. In the immediate future there will be less security than in the immediate past, less stability. It must be admitted that there is a degree of instability which is inconsistent with civilization. But, on the whole, the great ages have been unstable ages.

ALFRED NORTH WHITEHEAD
Science and the Modern World
Published by The Macmillan Co.

the crying on colic, which is, unfortunately, as common in breast-fed babies as in bottle-fed babies, and then see if the colic can be relieved by pacifier or some other method. There's nothing worse for worry about the breast milk than thinking about it all day. You have a perfect excuse to indulge yourself in distracting activities, whether it's TV, bridge, reading, shopping, visiting, or stepping out with your husband. If at all possible, get a sitter and get away from the house at least twice a week.

There are limits to all these suggestions. You can't let a baby who's getting almost nothing from the breast go for even a week without other feedings. Even though a baby is gaining a little weight, you can't hold him to the breast alone for several weeks if he's miserable with hunger a good part of the time. But even in these cases in which formula has to be given temporarily, the mother can later have another try at reviving the breast supply by deliberately cutting down the formula in each bottle by a quarter to half an ounce each day. This compels the baby's hunger to be expressed in more frequent and complete emptying of the breast.

In ordinary cases, though, in which the breast milk has become reasonably adequate in the hospital or soon after going home, no such serious problem need arise and no drastic remedy is required. All the mother has to say to herself when the baby fusses for the first time is: "It would be silly for me, who am interested in nursing, to assume right away that I can't do what hundreds of millions of women are doing all over the world right now, or to reach for a bottle which is known to be the most lethal weapon against breast feeding." In a great majority of cases it's as easy as that.

Corinne Griffith's COOKBOOK

"Wherever we traveled, I gathered recipes."

Seventh in a series of her round-the-world favorites.

This lovely-looking dessert is a year-round favorite, especially pleasing and pretty for luncheon, on ladies' day out.

ORANGE-ANGEL DESSERT

Cut 1 angel cake in half, horizontally. Pour ½ cup orange juice over the cut side of each layer, piercing the cake with a fork so that all the juice will be absorbed. Set aside. Mix 3 cups commercial sour cream with 6 tablespoons confectioners' sugar, 4 tablespoons orange juice—or, if you prefer, Cointreau—and 2 tablespoons grated orange rind. Spread about ⅓ of this cream mixture over the bottom layer of cake. Cover with the top layer, and spread the remaining cream mixture over the top and sides. Sprinkle 1 teaspoon grated orange rind over all. Place in the freezer until 10 minutes before serving.

These potatoes are tops with any lamb dish. Try them just once, and you'll see.

A NEW WAY WITH POTATOES

Wash thoroughly 18 small new potatoes and scrub with a brush to remove sand. Peel the potatoes only around the middle, about ⅓ the width of the potatoes. Boil as usual. When done, drain well and put into the oven just long enough to dry. Then literally shower them with salt. The salt should stick to the part that has been peeled. It's different and vedy, vedy chic.

One Christmas Eve in Paris we heard La Traviata at the Paris Opera House, and followed this with supper in one of the three crowded dining rooms at the Ritz. At a table near us was the Aga Khan, spiritual leader of millions of Moslems in India, and onetime father-in-law of Rita Hayworth. It was he who sent magnums of champagne to all the nearby diners. This was the salad which was served at midnight.

CELERY-ROOT SALAD

Peel 3 large celery roots. Combine in a saucepan 2 cups chicken stock, 1 large onion, peeled and cut into large pieces, several sprigs of parsley, 3 bay leaves, ½ teaspoon salt and a dash of pepper. Add celery roots and boil until just tender—about 25 minutes. Remove celery roots from broth and cut into long shoestring strips. Mix together ⅓ cup tarragon vinegar, ⅔ cup salad oil, ¼ teaspoon dry mustard, ¼ teaspoon salt and ⅛ teaspoon freshly ground pepper. Add to the celery root while it is still hot. Chill thoroughly. Drain and serve very cold on lettuce.

At one time Austine (Mrs. William Randolph Hearst, Jr.) held luncheon fashion shows in Washington. She had only to wave her hand and the wives of Supreme Court justices, senators, diplomats and Cabinet officers appeared.

Austine chattered along, commented on current events, and awarded prizes to the ladies. At these luncheons Chicken Austine was a feature.

CHICKEN AUSTINE

Make a sauce with 2 tablespoons butter or margarine, 2 tablespoons flour and ½ cup milk. Add 2 cups cooked diced chicken, ½ cup light cream, a dash of cayenne, ½ teaspoon Worcestershire sauce and 1 teaspoon salt. Simmer for 3 minutes. Remove from heat. Add 1 tablespoon sherry if you wish. Split 3 avocados, peel and remove pits. Fill the hollows with the chicken mixture. Brown under the broiler.

FITZMAURICE HASH

Wash 1 medium eggplant. Do not peel. Cut into ¼" slices. Sprinkle with ½ teaspoon salt. Cut 2 medium tomatoes into ¼" slices and sprinkle with ½ teaspoon salt. Sauté 1 large onion, chopped, in 1 tablespoon butter or margarine until tender. Add 1 pound ground round of beef and sauté until meat is well browned. Add 1 teaspoon salt and ⅛ teaspoon pepper. Sauté the eggplant slices in butter or margarine until brown on both sides, using a teaspoon of butter at a time. Drain. Mix meat, eggplant and tomato slices and place in a 4-quart casserole. Cover and bake in a moderate—350° F.—oven for 1 hour. Remove cover and brown for about 5 minutes. Makes 4–6 servings.

AFTERTHOUGHT

There is nothing in such good taste as plain boiled salmon; plain melted butter poured over the salmon, and plain freshly ground horse-radish sprinkled on top. Try it sometime with plain boiled new potatoes. It's just plain good.

PROTECTING CHILDREN AGAINST SEX OFFENDERS ...Omaha, Nebraska

LEW MERRIM

The open car door and an invitation from a stranger are signs of danger. In Omaha, Nebraska, P.T.A. members teach youngsters to refuse anyone who offers them a ride—and to write down the license number.

Parents and Teachers Can Help

By MARGARET HICKEY

Punishment is frequently all society has to offer the sex offender in the way of "treatment." We are hampered in helping sexually abnormal persons by scarcity of medical facilities and we are hindered in protecting our children by poor enforcement of inadequate laws which set offenders free after a jail term or a fine.

When parents become aroused to the danger to their children, as they did in Omaha (story opposite), they can band together to investigate conditions in their town and spur city officials to work toward better laws and enforcement and the establishment of a psychiatric clinic for offenders. These are long-range aims, of course, and take time. But parents and teachers can also prevent many sex crimes by training children to avoid perilous situations. Dr. Alice Sowers, director of the Family Life Institute at the University of Oklahoma, believes in talking over an objective plan of action with youngsters, stressing the importance of reporting suspicious actions of strangers to parents, teachers, a policeman, storekeeper or some older person. She offers specific advice for certain situations:

Any stranger who asks you to go anywhere with him—be polite but firm; say "No."

Any stranger who invites your friends to go with him—write down the license number of the stranger's car. No pencil handy? Scratch with a stone on the pavement or in the dust.

Any stranger who tries to talk with you in a movie theater—tell the usher.

Any stranger who tries to touch you at the movies—tell the usher.

Any stranger who tries to join you in games—be polite, but say "No." If he insists, report him.

Any stranger who talks to you, offers you candy or toys, invites you to get into a car with him, or bothers you in any way—report him at once to the first older person you see.

Youngsters need not be frightened by the possibility of having horrible things happen to them if parents use the same tone and approach as when they talk traffic safety, Doctor Sowers says. "Look to the left and to the right before you start to cross the street," a mother may tell her youngster, "and don't get in a car with a stranger." If an incident occurs in the neighborhood, the mother can minimize the disturbing effect it might have on her child by discussing it with him calmly. END

"This is no place for a child," Mrs. E. C. Torgerson thought as she looked around the police courtroom at the bums, petty criminals and drunks slouched on the wooden benches. Had she done right after all in persuading the little girl's mother to press charges?

Mrs. Torgerson was chairman of the Juvenile Protection Committee of the Omaha, Nebraska, P.T.A. council. She thought of her own little Susan as she watched the eight-year-old walk uncertainly toward the judge and face the defendant—a man accused of indecent exposure and trying to pick up the child in his car. Mrs. Torgerson strained to hear the murmured testimony of the six witnesses—neighbors who had seen the man in the car. Then she heard very audibly the judge's verdict: "Case dismissed—failure of proof."

All that afternoon in June, 1955, Clarice Torgerson wondered how children could be protected against such offenders. What was to prevent them from committing the same act again and again or eventually harming a child seriously? In April, the Omaha P.T.A. council had supported proposed state legislation to make a psychiatric examination compulsory for anyone picked up on a sex charge. Its efforts were unsuccessful.

Now, parents, knowing of the P.T.A.'s interest, called the council frequently. "This man has been trying to pick up children around our school and saying parents sent him," one father said. "We reported him to the police, but never heard any more about it." And from a distraught mother: "We sat in court for two hours before we discovered the hearing was over an hour before we arrived." Another: "Every time we call the police station, a different man is working on the case." . . . "Can the P.T.A. help us?" all wanted to know.

To find out whether laws were weak or whether there was a breakdown in law enforcement, Mrs. Harry F. Schneiderwind, council president for the term May, 1954, to May, 1956, asked Mrs. Torgerson and her committee to undertake a special study. Brunet Clarice Torgerson, though slim and small, nevertheless had a talent for organization and getting things done, and she was interested in the problem. Her first move was to study laws and court procedures. During the summer months of 1955 she and her committee members—Mrs. George Lindsay, Mrs. William Bell and Mrs. Glen Flynn, all mothers of school-age children—read and discussed a recent Juvenile Court survey, the state's sexual-psychopath law and city ordinances prohibiting sex offenses, and gathered figures on prosecution of cases from Douglas and other Nebraska counties. Their own Douglas County, they found, lagged behind others in prosecution.

In September, the committee called on Chief of Police Harry M. Green, told him about parent complaints about cases involving their children. The chief's answer was a suggestion: "Why don't you go through our police files—follow cases right from the time they're reported through the court prosecution?"

From then on, the committee was up to its ears in police "squeal sheets," the actual reports of crimes. Accompanied by twelve volunteer typists, all P.T.A. mothers and all carrying their own big standard typewriters, the committee set up headquarters at a long interrogation table in the Detective Bureau assembly room. Facing them on one wall were mug pictures of wanted criminals; on another, an exhibit of firearms. From an alcove behind them, they could hear detectives interviewing suspects in the daily roundup. Three detectives were assigned to bring in records of cases from various departments, including dusty boxes from the basement. The typists copied each squeal sheet, then committee members followed up as best they could.

It was a frustrating job, Clarice Torgerson recalls. Important documents were missing from some files. Many offenders were not charged under the sex ordinances and got off with lighter penalties or dismissals. Many cases were stalemated by delays or continuances until finally the victims dropped the charges. One of the reasons, they learned, was lack of man power in the city prosecutor's office. The system is wrong, a municipal judge told them. There was only one assistant prosecutor to handle a growing criminal docket without the time to investigate cases before they came up in Criminal Court. But whenever a case did get to court, a P.T.A. committee member was there to watch the prosecuting attorney in action, verify the stories of parents, take note of dismissed cases and postponements. Newspaper reporters, sensing a story, followed the women from courtroom to police station to City Hall and back again. But the women refused to tell what they were doing.

During these weeks of research and investigation, lunches were forgotten. Mrs. Torgerson would drive Susan to school, work at the police station from 9:30 A.M. to 3 P.M., then hurry out to pick up Susan and get supper ready. Husbands helped out with meal planning and dishwashing (George Lindsay later complained of dishpan hands). Finally, when the police files were completed and the women had pulled together a list of all known sex offenders, which previously had not existed, they went into District Court. Again they received willing cooperation. The clerk opened his files to them, and the typing continued into January.

These cases were not complete either—and there were long delays in the disposition of many appeal cases. Mrs. Lindsay tells of watching one District Court hearing in which a child was trying to remember details of an incident that had taken place fourteen months before. Again, some sex offenders were brought up on other charges. A typical case concerned a man accused of molesting three different children within six weeks. Each time the offender was released on bond. Some suspects were never seen again. After putting up a $100 bond they were released and simply vanished.

At the end of January, 1956, the committee went to Lincoln to talk to Gov. Victor E. Anderson and Attorney General Clarence S. Beck about their findings on the 300 cases they had studied for 1954 and 1955. "Our chief concern is for the safety of our children," Mrs. Lindsay said, pointing out that

He who is most slow in making a promise is usually the most faithful in the performance of it.

the 1955 cases represented a 50 per cent increase in reported molestation cases over 1954. "And we're wondering about the dismissals of repeat offenders. We want to find out if our laws are weak or the blame lies in court procedures."

Both the attorney general and the governor agreed that Nebraska law was adequate. The "debauching a minor" statute provided for psychiatric examination on a second morals charge, after which an offender might be committed to a state mental hospital if found to be a sexual psychopath. If not found to be a sexual psychopath, an offender can be imprisoned in the penitentiary for not less than five nor more than ten years. Under the sexual-psychopath law, an offender so charged is examined by two psychiatrists. If the latter concur, the offender may be committed by the court to one of the four state mental hospitals for treatment. But many escaped the state law, the women emphasized, pointing to their report, instead were charged with vagrancy, assault and battery or other nonsex violations. And in these cases, the records of those convicted did not show that the actual offense involved sex deviation.

"This is definitely a problem of local enforcement," the governor felt. But, he pointed out, the state could not tell local officials how to run their business. That was a job the P.T.A. could do—by assuming a "watchdog" role to see that sex-offense laws were properly enforced.

"But what about these delays in criminal cases and the lack of complete records in the hands of our authorities?" the women wanted to know.

Governor Anderson then suggested that the group confer with city and county officials. He himself would attend the meeting, he said.

Driving back to Omaha, the committee talked over the governor's suggestion and came to the conclusion that taking their report to local officials would be like working on a book review for a year and then handing it back to the author.

Instead, the Juvenile Protection Committee consulted several attorney members of P.T.A. and drew up detailed recommendations for improving law enforcement in sex cases. Then they gathered together their files and made an appointment to see the editor of the Omaha World-Herald. On February 27, 1956, the newspaper proclaimed on its front page: "P.T.A. Asserts Sex Offenses Against Children Mishandled," with synopses of thirty-seven of the actual cases studied by the P.T.A. appearing on a full page inside. The following day, the Juvenile Protection Committee's recommendations were published—"a most impressive social document," the newspaper commented editorially.

Judges "no longer qualified" to sit on the bench were urged to resign. The county attorney's office was asked to adopt an "adequate records and follow-up" system to prevent "forgotten" cases. All deputy attorneys, the P.T.A. said, should be hired full time and prevented from carrying on private practice. The P.T.A. asked for higher bonds on persons committing sex offenses against children. It also urged the hiring of full-time attorneys in the city prosecutor's office so "the prosecutor will have full knowledge of the facts prior to entering the courtroom." The police department was asked to assign full-time officers to sex cases.

A week later at a city-wide P.T.A. meeting, 400 members of the Omaha council greeted the reading of the recommendations with a loud burst of applause. Individual units contributed $750 toward the committee's future expenses.

To step up the police program of prevention of child-molestation cases and apprehension of offenders, Chief Green ordered 50,000 cards to be printed and distributed by P.T.A. to parents and teachers. The cards carried simple rules for children to follow: "Point out the dangers of associating with strangers and caution them against going for rides or walks with anyone they do not know; teach them to write down the license numbers of cars driven by persons who attempt to pick them up or molest them in any manner. Tell them to notify the first person they see or go to the nearest house so the police may be called immediately. Get a description of the man, his appearance and wearing apparel and color of car."

A woman happy with her husband is better for their children than a hundred books on child welfare.

ANON.

To encourage parents and teachers to report all suspicious characters, Chief Green promised that all reports would be followed up immediately. The department had just received approval from city council for 20 new men (in addition to 15 extra already approved in the 1956 budget) because of a recognized need for more police protection in Omaha. Now Chief Green could order school areas to be rigidly patrolled during hours children were en route to and from school.

One plain-clothes detective soon learned how vigilant parents and teachers had become. Answering a complaint about a man trying to pick up children near a school, he spent an entire lunch hour parked near the school watching for the suspect. He saw nothing out of the usual and went back to the station. In his absence, he discovered, another alarm had been turned in—and the description fitted him perfectly, even down to his license number!

In March the first recommendation from the P.T.A. survey went into effect when Chief Green announced the appointment of Sgt. John Gallagher to handle all sex-molestation cases and to co-operate with the P.T.A. in their future surveys. Furthermore, Sergeant Gallagher had already started to set up a new record system to follow sex cases from their very beginning to their disposition. This would result in better prosecution, he felt, because previous police records must always be offered as evidence in a new case.

On May 9, the mayor and city council followed Chief Green's example by appointing two additional half-time assistant prosecutors to the city legal department.

A special committee appointed by the Bar Association to study the P.T.A. survey helped put into effect another recommendation. The bar committee asked the presiding judge of Municipal Court to hear all sex cases involving children in City Hall instead of Police Court. From then on, private hearings, with only parents, victims, witnesses and a P.T.A. representative allowed to attend, were scheduled in City Hall.

Another group deeply troubled by the revelations of the P.T.A. survey was the Omaha Council of Churches. Shortly after publication of the survey, the council's Committee on Community Relations talked to several leading attorneys from all religious groups. Newspaper reporters and a judge of the District Court were there. Their opinions all pointed to the same problem, Dr. Edward W. Stimson, of Dundee Presbyterian Church, reported back to the Council of Churches: the existence of an informal "you-help-me-I'll-help-you" arrangement involving certain defense attorneys, judges, prosecuting attorneys and professional bondsmen. This "palsy-walsy" co-operation, as Doctor Stimson put it, resulted in continuances, delays and general inefficiency. Lowered police morale and discouraged witnesses resulted.

With church permission, Doctor Stimson organized a Citizens Committee for Law Enforcement. Twenty leading Omahans—businessmen, the superintendent of schools, past president of the League of Women Voters—were to recruit good new candidates for the municipal and district courts and actively back a slate. Individual P.T.A. members helped quietly by campaigning. Said one mother who had helped type the P.T.A. survey results, "This is the first time I've been really sure about my vote in a local election." Churchwomen telephoned voters and sent out election fliers. Businessmen helped pay for newspaper advertisements.

On Election Day, the entire Citizens Committee slate for both courts was put into office.

Clarice Torgerson, continuing her work on the "watchdog" committee, will tell you now that there are fewer dismissals and postponements. Appeal cases are moving along more rapidly. She has expanded her Juvenile Protection Committee to include a chairman at nearly every public school in Omaha. These women encourage parents to report every incident involving a child so that police will have complete information about sex offenders. Then Sergeant Gallagher, who wears plain clothes and drives an unmarked car, will call at the home to get the facts, even drive the child and her parents to court. When a case goes to court, the Juvenile Protection chairman from the school is there, too, giving moral support and observing how laws are being enforced.

The P.T.A. hopes eventually for state legislation making psychiatric examination compulsory for anyone picked up on a sex charge, and also providing early psychiatric care for juveniles who show signs of sex deviation. To further that aim, the P.T.A. in recent weeks has been meeting with psychiatrists of the Nebraska Psychiatric Institute, the presiding judge of the District Court, a state legislator and a representative from the county attorney's office.

"A fine or jail is not the answer. Judges should have another choice," Mrs. Torgerson declares. That is the goal the P.T.A. Juvenile Protection Committee is working toward. END

"The trouble with chintz is that I'm always sorry afterwards."

The perfect book for April is A GUIDE TO EARLY AMERICAN HOMES, by Dorothy and Richard Pratt (McGraw-Hill). This comes in two volumes, North and South—from Maine to Delaware and from Maryland to Florida. These should be superlative traveling companions, especially on a long leisurely automobile trip, for they contain not only exquisite photographs, many of which we have already seen in the JOURNAL, but pithy historical data about the houses, and information as to how to reach them, and when and how to get into them. To drive thus, slowly and beautifully into the past, sounds like heaven!

When an English visitor in India complained that there were 9,000,000 monks at large begging from the people, Rabindranath Tagore, the famous literary figure of the day, replied that there probably were that many, and that it was worth while to support them all because among them there were nine saints. Were there, he asked, nine saints in England? . . . A devout Moslem enters a telephone booth at the United Nations at regular intervals daily, it is said, faces toward Mecca and performs his act of prayer.

English naturalist Gerald Durrell has written another amusing book, MY FAMILY AND OTHER ANIMALS (Viking). This is a departure for its prolific author, but if you have had the unalloyed joy that comes with reading The Overloaded Ark and The Bafut Beagles, you will devour what that particular naturalist-on-the-prowl has to say now of life on Corfu. This is where his mother took her four children to live when little Gerry was ten. It is a busy funny book. His wife laughed uproariously when reading the manuscript, he says, which pleased him greatly until he learned that it was his spelling that amused her. I not only laughed with him, but followed the small-size detailed nature wandering of the ten-year-old with complete absorption. Especially when he brought a female scorpion into the house with hundreds of babies on her back, and inadvertently left her overnight in a matchbox in the dining room.

Gerald's brother is Lawrence Durrell, the poet. Even in the Corfu days Larry was the bookish one. In fact, when the family flew there from England his luggage consisted of two trunks of books and a briefcase containing his clothes. Gerry carried a butterfly net, a dog, and a jam jar full of caterpillars all in imminent danger of turning into chrysalids.

An American naturalist, Hal Borland, has also written a fine book, THIS HILL, THIS VALLEY (Simon & Schuster). It is made up of those excellent nature paragraphs which appear on the editorial page of The New York Times, arranged here in chronological order to give a portrait of the country year. (Hal Borland wrote a book about his Colorado boyhood that came out last year, High, Wide and Lonesome.)

THE BLACK OBELISK, by Erich Maria Remarque (Harcourt, Brace), though classed as fiction, is surely a picture of the author as a young man in Germany, the war behind him and the world ahead.

This is Germany in 1923, when inflation was at its height and the country in the grip of a wild exhilaration. The onetime soldiers are now running a gravestone business and lighting their cigarettes with hundred-mark bills. But there is no bitterness. It is a brilliant picture of the carefree gaiety of a long-past European youth, and one knows what delight Remarque must have had in its complete recapture.

Hildegarde Dolson, well known to JOURNAL readers, has written a most engaging novel, A GROWING WONDER (Random House), about some odd characters in New York's artistic Bohemia. There is not a cliché in the book, or a figure that doesn't jump up, alive, on the page.

This is a love story, also the story of a remarkable child—a young Leonardo comparable to Aldous Huxley's Young Archimedes in its understanding of youthful genius. For good measure Miss Dolson toasts a progressive school to a nice brown, and does a deadly job on one of those arrogant self-centered sweet-girl graduates.

Sometimes you see an ill-assorted couple and wonder. Martha Albrand, author of many a thriller, has apparently also seen such a combination, and it has given her pause: a mean little man, physically repulsive, scheming, coarse; and a sensitive, charming young woman, well born and cultivated. How—with all the world's vagaries—could this be? This is the question she essays to answer in her novel, THE OBSESSION OF EMMET BOOTH, and it comes out an absorbing and sinister psychological tale. (Random House.)

Another situation for a novelist to ponder—one that comes up too often in our American life—is that of parents' divorce and its effect upon the children.

There have been many novels written on this painful subject, but the most appealing I have read is SUNDAYS FROM TWO TO SIX, by Virginia Abaunza (Bobbs Merrill). This is told from the point of view of a young girl whose mother has just broken the news, and it is fresh, tender, sometimes even amusing in its picture of family life—a lovely book.

With Easter coming upon us so late, in what should be the first full flush of spring, and a big snowstorm predicted for the following week, we are of two minds about which book to recommend—WORLD RELIGIONS, by Benson T. Landis, or Joe Bolton's THE WIND AND THE WEATHER. Possibly even the (Old) FARMER'S ALMANACK, which predicts the storm and must be expected to speak with authority, having survived since 1792.

The Wind and the Weather (Crowell) is a good readable book on that ever-popular subject, presented rather breezily on the scientific side—on higher levels of the air, sunspots, all the special 1957 fantastica; and very cozily on weather folklore.

World Religions (Dutton) is a handy guide to the principal beliefs and teachings of all religions. Each religion is neatly described in a paragraph or so, put in alphabetical order, with statistics, and an occasional aside.

Only fine silverware has lifelong beauty like this!

Picture this Community pattern in your guests' hands. And picture your own pride in choosing it, and using it, over the years. There's an undeniable warmth, a living sparkle to fine silverware that nothing less can begin to approach. For only in silver is it possible to achieve the clarity of detail and enduring beauty that distinguishes all five Community silverplate patterns. This is the essence of Community quality—the reason that "make-do" tableware is inevitably disappointing in today's trend to elegance. The Community* pattern collection is created in the Design Studios of Oneida Ltd. Silversmiths. See it today, at your jeweler's or silverware department, and see how it can bring new beauty into your life.

CLEAN CLEAR THROUGH —and Deodorized Too!

THAT'S A FAB WASH!

YOU GET WASHES SO WHITE, THEY DAZZLE YOUR EYES... colors so bright, they look gayer than new. But FAB gives you something more, too—a deodorizing action that leaves everything you wash the freshest possible and clean clear through!

Not just surface clean . . . not merely bleachy white, but far, far more—as if suds and sunlight had pierced through and cleansed every invisible mesh of every inch of every fabric. And when you wear FAB-washed clothes . . . use FAB-washed towels . . . fall asleep on FAB-washed linens . . . it's like having a fresh, clean breeze whispering about you. So let your next wash be clean clear through—and deodorized, too. That's your FAB wash.

Protect Your Future

Jacksonville, Florida

Dear Journal Editors: Since my work is in the field of financial planning, I read with interest your stories on young family couples. But when I examine the "typical family budget," I often notice a glaring shortcoming which is all too common in today's family finances. This is the low amount that is allowed for life insurance. It is tragic to imagine the financial situation of these otherwise happy families should the husband die.

Very truly yours,
RICHARD H. HEBEL

Backache or Pain in the Neck?

Lavonia, Georgia

Dear Editors: Why aren't children taught the simple rules of being a good guest? We love our grandchildren dearly—but it takes a long time for "aching backs" to get things in order after they have a field day in the dresser drawers, cabinets, etc. Their mothers never see a thing wrong and get offended when I do!

Sincerely,
H.E.B.

We'll Deliver

North Wales, Great Britain

Sir: I wish to say that I'm thoroughly disgusted with America and its government on its foreign policy. I've yet to meet a bigger bunch of hypocrites, whose motto is "Don't do as I do—do as I say."

Britons, as a whole, are furious. Considering we won the war for you, and you only came in when it was thought the enemy had the upper hand, your country has the biggest nerve of all time.

If I thought your President would receive any letter I wrote, I'd send him a copy of this.

MARGUERITE BUDD

Full House!

Toledo, Oregon

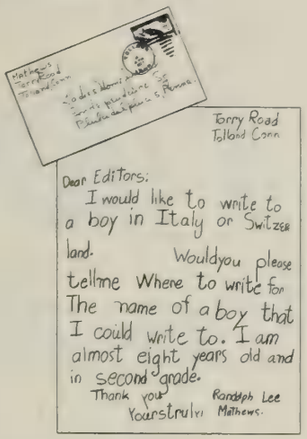
Dear Editors: I surely enjoy meeting in print the families in your How America Lives series. After having seven children by birth, we recently adopted two tiny, undernourished GI babies from Korea, giving us nine youngsters under ten years.

Busy but happy.

My days are very busy, and sometimes with earaches, tummy-aches or such, nights can be, too; but I am so thankful for my precious family.

Sincerely yours,
MRS. ROBERT BUEL

America's No. 1 Killer



Great Notch, New Jersey

Dear Editors: My husband and I have just returned from an inspiring weekend on a college campus where his daughter is a student. However, hazardous highway conditions made us wonder what lies ahead for motorists—except death. To heighten my fear, the college president was on crutches because of an injury in a car last summer. He longed for the horse-and-buggy days and sometimes I do too.

Aren't the women of America worried about the mounting traffic toll? Unless someone does something, there will, in the future, be very few contented grandmothers.

Sincerely yours,
KATHLEEN K. ALLENBY

Found: a Friend

With Love to Pop

North Hollywood, California

Dear Editors: For many years I was under the illusion that unless pop did all the things required by the ideal standards (such as hunting, fishing, workshop, Boy Scouting, camping), his boys would grow up frustrated, lacking in feeling for their parents and with no basis of understanding with their father. Since my husband's business frequently required that he work nights, Saturdays and sometimes Sundays, I shed many tears, accused him of parental lack of devotion, ad nauseam.

It's taken me all this time to realize that it isn't what father does with the children, but how.

I've been active in youth programs lately. I've heard young snips talk to their parents with contempt, and I've listened to the parents' meek, apologetic replies. Many of these are daddies who have attended every open house at school, have taken a yearly vacation with the children, but have missed the boat somewhere.

My husband has always treated the children with the same sensitivity, consideration and tact that he would accord a prize customer. To a twelve-year-old girl applying perfume with a heavy hand, he discussed scents and why they should be applied with a light, delicate touch. He spent forty minutes discussing sex with his sons one night after one remarked "that girl is a tramp." He taught them that no thirteen-year-old is a tramp without the help of boys who have made her that way. He can even make dishwashing desirable to an eight-year-old by the simple process of saying, "This is part of growing up and learning to be a woman."

With equal skill father can mambo with the girls and Indian wrestle with the boys. All his love has paid off in huge dividends. It is never necessary for him to argue, shout or use physical abuse because he is "father" in every sense of the word.

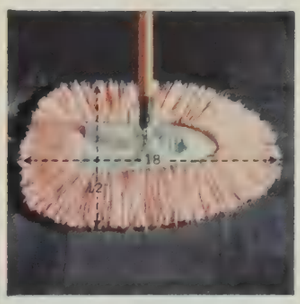
Sincerely,
RUTH ZUSMER

Mealtime Fun

Cranbury, New Jersey

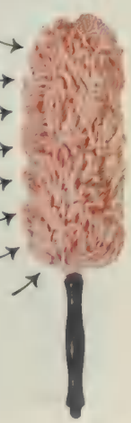
Dear Journal: In one of your issues last year I read a delightful article by a housewife explaining her idea of giving children a smörgåsbord of carrot sticks, celery, raisins, dates and cheeses for in-between meals rather than the usual cookies, crackers, cakes and soft drinks. I adopted this idea for my own family and we have used it ever since.

I am convinced that good nutrition is the soundest kind of preventive medicine.



O cedar "Every-Which-Way" Mops speed dusting of hard-to-reach places!

Darts around furniture legs at a flick of the wrist—goes around corners, too.



Save work—save dusting time—with an O-Cedar "Every-Which-Way" mop in colorful nylon or cotton. The "Magic-Action" Swivel Socket steers to any position—lets you dust around chair and table legs—even under low furniture. Pads remove easily—wash out quickly. Insist on the genuine O-Cedar Dust Mop that goes "Every-Which-Way." Choice of beautiful pink, blue or white nylon, $3.95. In yellow, turquoise or white cotton, $2.79.

Swivel Socket lets you twist the handle to dust a 50% wider path—speeds dusting.

New NYLON DUSTER with "Magne-Static" Action

Attracts dust like magic—really holds it. Makes dusting of furniture, woodwork, venetian blinds faster and easier. 100% nylon pad removes easily—washes and dries quickly. Ask your dealer for the new O-Cedar Nylon Duster—only $2.29.

The children often bring hungry friends home from school. I fast discovered that if you intend to offer substitutes for soft drinks or candy, the substitutes must be attractive. Socially acceptable treats are molasses cupcakes, peanut-butter or cheese sandwiches, milk served with straws. Budget-wise, a bowl of popcorn or unshelled peanuts or fruit such as oranges or apples is good. Milk shakes made with whole milk, molasses and powdered milk are a special favorite.

At a summer supper party for guests from five to seven years old I arranged a Lazy Susan in the middle of a low buffet and each child chose what he wanted for his own plate. The smörgåsbord fare included midget wieners and squares of cheese with toothpick handles, and we relaid the buffet three times.

I try to bear in mind the individual preferences of my family as I plan our meals. And I am a full believer in children in the kitchen—not whenever they please, but upon the cook's invitation. Our happy reception of dark-molasses bread, wheat-germ cookies and whole-wheat-flour pancakes may have been due to the fact that the children helped in the mixing. I let them decorate cookies to their hearts' content and if it is Saturday night or Sunday morning they are allowed to shape their own pancakes on the griddle.

It has been a comfort to know that an excellent diet can be planned within a moderate budget. Often the foods which are the most nourishing are the least expensive. There is probably no cheaper way to insure extra calcium and protein in your diet than to whip a half cup of powdered milk into each quart of milk used for beverage, cooking or breakfast cereals. We have found that our "new-look" breakfast, including supplementary vitamins, costs under thirty cents per person and you can have a beautifully balanced luncheon of yoghurt, salad greens and fruits and cream-cheese sandwich for the same price.

I have found that working with your own family for better health can be satisfying. And it is little moments like this that count most. One day when my daughter caught me at my culinary contriving she said, "What! Liver tonight? Oh, well, you know it's funny; I don't really like liver yet but I do get hungry for it."

Sincerely,
BARBARA EWING YLVISAKER

It Burns Me Up!

I would just like to ask: Why don't more mothers insist on their sons' learning something about cooking? When I am ill, my little girl and I almost starve. Canned soup, usually a friend, at such times becomes a mortal enemy. My husband can not cook.

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

"I'm going to fix that banging shutter that keeps waking him up. Why?"

I've almost convinced my Dream Girl that if you want conversation, a dinner party must be limited to six, including hosts. Beyond that something like panic prevails, nobody listens, or too many.

Two or three of our town's plump men agree that they eat less when their wives show 'em enough affection. A vicious circle: their wives might show 'em more affection if they weren't so fat.

"Peter thinks I talk too much," muses Betty Comfort, mending a mismated pair of garden gloves. "I tell him I'm only the seventh most talkative woman in our crowd, but he argues he doesn't have to listen so much to the others."

Neither our youngest nor I have quite lived up to our agreement that he'll get the car only once a week unless he keeps up a B average in his studies. Maybe B seems a little high, but a C average seems low for the driver of a 240-h.p. car.

After all these years, we haven't agreed yet on two controversial things in our family: (1) what kind of new shelves to install in the kitchen; and (2) where to put the compost pile. I'm offering to compromise: my Lady Love's choice on one, mine on the other. As yet, no deal.

A few of our affluent neighbors with new swimming pools are laying it on thick this spring, talking of opening 'em up the middle of April. They say the water and heating gas cost less than estimated, so they can afford to shiver an extra month.

Of all the marvels at Disneyland, my Dream Girl admired most the multicolored rock gardens beyond the tuna-fish galleon. (Myself, I wondered if Walt Disney himself ever actually tasted that shipboard tuna-fish pie.)

Our town's globetrotters are no longer content with trips merely to Europe or Asia. They don't stir a ripple unless they fly clear around the world, and in much less than eighty days. I'll still settle for a month in Stockholm or Rome.

I'd barely got my last double-breasted suit converted into a single-breaster when the men's clothiers on Walnut Street decreed that double-breasted suits are back again. They'll make us as edgy about styles as our wives.

We lit more fires in our fireplace this winter than ever before. As my wife sensibly reminds me, not only are the hearth fires a joy, but the wood ashes will be beneficial in the garden.

My neighbor who at first declined to take a camera to Europe has brought home 400 three-dimensional pictures. He declines to urge anybody to look at them, but keeps an open boxful handy, with two stereoscopic viewers nearby.

We're waiting for the music savants to choose the 100 most soothing popular tunes and the 100 most soothing classics. With these in their phonograph racks, Americans might cut down on tranquilizer pills.

Wives who work are winning the argument "Who prepares the twenty-one meals a week?" Even stubborner husbands cook three or four a week, more if they're proud barbecuers. With two or three meals a week out, a few skipped, sandwiches occasionally brought home, chow mein or fried chicken phoned for, the problem dissolves.

Secretly, I feel silly when I remonstrate with my favorite gardener to buy fertilizer and peat moss in quantities she needs, use 'em up each season, no leftovers. I'd hate to be asked to figure that closely myself.

They'll deny it, but youngsters do, ultimately and secretly, imitate pa and ma; if we want well-behaved children we must act like well-behaved parents, even if it hurts.

Our luncheon-table optimist consoles us: Inheritance taxes are the initiation fee for membership in the world's luckiest country; income tax, in a way, the annual dues.

What baffles some of our local fat men is that, even if they eat 1000 calories a day of nonfattening foods after four or five thousand calories of fattening dainties, they still gain weight.

Some pilgrims to California find Pershing Square, the eccentric debating center in Los Angeles, as fascinating as the homes of the stars. Few refugees from Beverly Hills mansions, but plenty of deep thinkers on old-age-pension checks.

At our local cocktail parties conversation is impossible. But a bold, determined man can inject (1) a breezy seven-word greeting, (2) a brilliant nine-word epigram about Ike, and (3) a devastating thirteen-word exit line. He repeats these to each guest and then sneaks into his host's den with a good book.

I still bless the memory of the teacher who made me memorize "On the rude bridge that arched the flood, their flag to April's breeze unfurled, there the embattled farmers stood, and fired the shot heard round the world." And I'd wager she can find three mistakes.

I made only three New Year's resolutions for 1957, and one of 'em is to play nine holes of golf three times a week; eighteen is too much, but nine's just enough to save me from forgetting how to walk.

A few delicate souls from our neighborhood are shocked when they find floats in the Pasadena parade or enchantments in Disney's fairyland commercially sponsored. Wasn't America put together that way?

What amazes me about the modern young wife is that she can knit the most magnificent Argyle socks in the world but doesn't know how to darn 'em when they wear out in one or two strategic corners.

I hoped my tennis-practice problem was solved when I saw advertised a $12 ball thrower. But it tosses only Ping-pong balls or such, and the tennis-ball throwers still cost $300, if you can find one.

Since her baby began to crawl around the house, our daughter's begun to attach a small bell to her. This not only delights the baby but perhaps saves her from being stepped on or tripped over.

. . . When our flying son coaxes us to save our vacations so we can visit him in Japan . . . Or my Dream Girl gives me a gold toothpick for my birthday as a gag, because I once gave my father a gold toothpick . . . And our youngest wishes the intellectual could be as arrogant as the rich . . . And my daughter-in-law finds and gives me three yellow tennis balls for our dark court four years after I mentioned 'em . . . Then I muse secretly that we husbands and fathers have it more golden than we deserve.

hope deferred is not hope blighted. What these people must have is the feeling that they're moving ahead, maybe only a little, but that today is a little better than yesterday and tomorrow will be better than today."

I like Americans because they still have the frontier spirit—the spirit that believes mountains exist to be scaled, forests to be tracked, minerals to be mined and disease to be eradicated.

The young American stewardess and the American pilot on the Iranian Airways operating between Kabul, the capital of Afghanistan, and Tehran, the capital of Iran, are pioneers, though I don't suppose that thought has ever crossed their minds.

The route in winter is one of the most hazardous on the globe, through ranges of mountains too high, in places, to be overflown and with weather that cannot be predicted even hour by hour. Yet this route is the only existing communication between two large neighboring countries which border the Russian frontier for several thousands of miles.

The French operated this airline for a time, but gave it up after too many crashes. American pilots have not lost a plane in three years of operation.

The captain who piloted us was young, gay at times and grim at others. His word was law. The plane was unpressurized and at times we felt as though our lungs would burst. When sandstorms and fog obscured the mountains, none of us felt exactly confident. When they lifted we found ourselves living in and out among mountains that seemed about to scratch our wings. Tears of fear rushed to some passengers' eyes.

Why did the young pilot choose to work for this airline? "It's a good job," he said. But one knew from the way he said it that the challenge moved him. This was a job that needed to be done and which others had abandoned.

The little stewardess, pretty as a cover girl in her trim uniform and as American as ice-cream soda, is known in every terminal along the way, protected and admired by everyone. She spent her childhood in Iran, the daughter of an engineer working for an American construction company. She went to the American College in Beirut and then rejoined her family in Tehran. "Well, being an American, I wanted to work. And I just love it!"

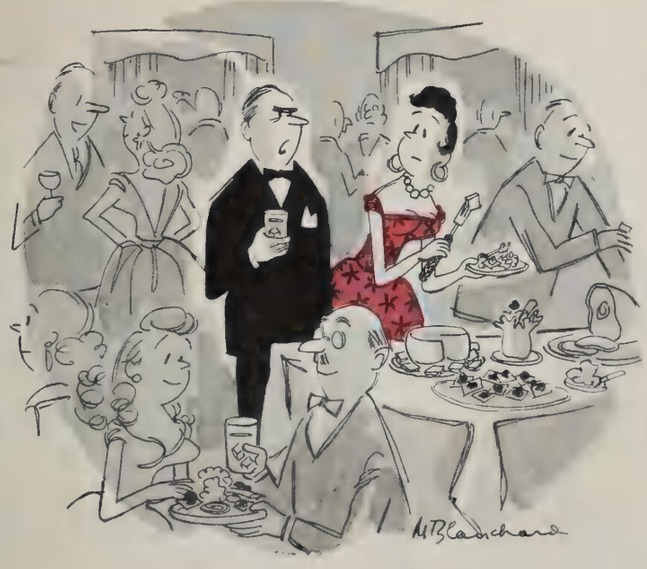
How many cups of strong sweet tea and pulverized coffee she served on our foodless flight from Kandahar to Isfahan and then on to Tehran, one could hardly count. How comforting her laugh, how interesting her stories of people whom she has met and changes which she has seen. How infectious her belief in the future of two countries not her own.

I like Americans because of their infinite capacity to make themselves comfortable, and to make as many others as possible comfortable also.

At Kandahar we put down to go no farther that day. The first figure we saw at the airport was a white-haired, tan-faced, loose-moving six-footer in drill pants and a leather jacket. Some kind friend had radiotelephoned him from Kabul that five American passengers were arriving, lunchless. He had a huge carton full of sandwiches on his arm. T. Y. Johnston is the chief engineer and director of the great dam projects which eventually will irrigate a million desert acres and furnish electric power to the city and its surroundings. This is a private enterprise being built for the government on contract, and now with some "Point Four" aid.

Just the sight of him at the freezing airport suggested warmth and cheer. It wasn't only lunch we needed but fires, dinner and beds. In a jiffy we were driven into the camp where 133 Americans are living (30 of them with wives). They have built a guesthouse into which we were ushered—a big, warm sitting room with plump sofas and chairs, simple but cozy bedrooms, baths with plentiful hot water, a bright, warm mess hall with American food of the hearty variety. A big welcoming cake suddenly reminded me that it was my husband's birthday! We drank toasts in boiling-hot coffee—and then to bed.

There is nothing among Americans abroad of the old imperial colonial spirit decreeing that one must dress for dinner whether in a jungle or an icy wilderness. The symbol of America is plumbing which functions, warm hospitality to the unexpected guest and the comforts, if not the refinements, of home. No one speaks of "natives"; they speak of workers. "Astonishingly good when you consider that they never saw anything mechanical until a few years ago. Reliable, too, in general."



"Do they steal?"

"Why do they steal?"

"Because they're so poor. Too poor. No human being should have to live as they do. But they won't. Not forever. They've got it in them to do what any other people can do—with hope and opportunity."

Yes, indeed, I like Americans. I certainly do! END

DIARY of DOMESTICITY

By Gladys Taber

DI PIETRO

Jonquil knocks on the front door when lunchtime comes around.

This is the changeable month in New England. We have all the weather there can be. It reminds me of the early days when the Yankee peddlers drove their wagons around the country, with everything from pins to pills, pans to portraits, and watches that never ran. So now April is a weather peddler, and the merchandise is varied!

In the record I keep, I note that in the past five years in April we have had snow, rain, fog, sun, high wind, hard freezes and sun-bathing days. Sometimes I am picking the first white daffodils, and sometimes wading through the deepest snows of the year.

Those of us used to it would, I suspect, have a hard time in a climate where day after day, season after season did not change at all. I dearly love to read of those islands in the sea as I huddle by the applewood fire, but there is something inexpressibly exciting about going out after a snowfall and finding the crocuses like amethysts in the border.

The peddlers were typically New England, although the patent-medicine men were universal. One endearing trait they had was that of vending portraits, and the method they used was pure Yankee. They painted the portraits, leaving the faces blank, and then put in the faces as they sold the paintings. I think it would be pleasant to choose a nice figure in gay costume and then simply have my own features popped in. One could then pick a lissome girlish representation and never mind reality. It was fine for men, too, for they could appear hanging over the mantel in elegant rig even if they never owned a stock or a broadsword.

I like to read about the past of my country, for I think it helps interpret today. There was a deal of cruelty and persecution, much bitterness and intolerance, but there were fine men and women who illumined the dark pages of history, too, and there were many brave deeds done. During the bloody Civil War there were times when the Confederates and the Union soldiers shared rations, slipping back and forth between the lines. Over a lighted twist of shared tobacco, Southern drawl and clipped speech became one language.

As simple men were swept into this war on both sides, they often had no idea what it was all about. I suspect this is true of many wars, and the day might come when ordinary folk would have to know or they would not pick up the guns and go forth.

My favorite ancestor is the Reverend Richard Mather, who stopped a storm at sea in 1672 by his prayers. I can see him, a short, compact figure with the thin Mather nose, firmly addressing God on a wind-swept deck. I would give a deal to know whether he spent the rest of his life being simply unbearable around the house because he had prevailed against the awful forces of nature by being so firm with God! Somehow I pity his wife if ever the venison was not done to his liking!

My own father had a strong sense that God was always on his side and it went hard with him if God did not co-operate fully on weather and the stock market and politics. Sometimes it seemed to me, as a child, that God had to watch his step to co-operate enough with papa.

It is just as well papa did not live to see the invasion of Hungary, for I am sure he would have tried to go single-handed to drive the Russians out, all the time quoting the Bible back to God.

The Farmer's Almanac says firmly, "Nothing wrong here, except last big snow of the year." This reminds me of Beverly Nichols' friend who always puts N W H on the upper corner of letters. Nothing wrong here. I think this is a lovely idea, for so often when we get a letter, we hold it fearfully in our hand before opening it, wondering just what is wrong now. A letter with N W H on the outside is so reassuring.

Our telegrams go through Waterbury, which is impersonal. I liked it better when I was growing up and the operator would say, "There is a wire for you and they don't say anything important. Don't worry. And I don't advise your doing it either." This is a very cozy way to live.

We used to be on an eight-party line, too, and it was pleasant to be planning a picnic and swim with someone and have another listener drop in on the line and say, "Why don't we all go to Mount Tom and we will bring part of the lunch?"

In April we like to have a buffet, possibly so everyone can talk about the garden they will have this time, better than any other garden they ever had. When we entertain, we never count the calories because it is a nice change for us to eat something really good. Lois Klakring's chicken-and-ham casserole is perfect for those suppers by the fire. It serves four to six, but I double it for our usual number.

It calls for 6 equal slices of cooked chicken and ham. Easy to have on hand. Then you mince an onion and cook it in ¼ cup butter or margarine until golden (not brown). Add ½ cup sliced mushrooms and 1 teaspoon each paprika and salt, and ½ teaspoon grated nutmeg. I use canned broiled-in-butter mushrooms sometimes instead of fresh, and I never use nutmeg since Jill, who lives and eats with me, is allergic to it (if she knows it is there; otherwise it is all right). Simmer mushrooms and seasonings about 5 minutes. Then turn mixture into a shallow casserole, lay ham on top, then chicken on ham. Then add (don't count the calories, this is a party) ¾ cup hot heavy cream. Cover with grated Parmesan cheese. Bake in hot oven, 400° F., until cheese is bubbly brown. Delicious! Calls for seconds, as Annie would say.

Salad and fruit for dessert. Fruit is best at room temperature, so take out the apples and pears and oranges an hour before.

Cockers and Irish love the smell of spring. They go a little mad when the snow melts, and race in dizzy circles. Often Jonquil is so busy running that she bumps into her son, Teddy, and knocks him flat. She is a dedicated chaser and bringer in of moles, dead mice, old tin cans, dead rubbers. Jonquil is such a gay and smiling cocker, and her tail wags even when she is sound asleep. I think she would do better on the commercials than some of the gilded smooth girls with fixed smiles and artificial speech as they do their stint on TV. Jonnie would be so natural!

Dogs just have to be natural. That may be one reason I love them. When people come that they do not take to, they are polite but noncommittal. They turn a cool eye toward guests who gush and jingle at them. But when Admiral Klakring and his wife Lois came for lunch, they mobbed them. They didn't give a fig for a war record or fame or citations. They said, in unison, these are wonderful friends. Nice eyes, lovely smiles, gentle voices. In fact, said Holly, throwing herself in Burt's lap, why don't you just live here? Plenty of room! Maybe some of the submarine crews would have been surprised to see the immaculate admiral with an armful of rather muddy dogs.

Now the fire still burns on the hearth on cool damp nights. Potatoes wrapped in foil bake sweetly in the embers, and have a flaky texture. Ham steaks are good, too, cooked over the coals.

A few of the pine cones I gathered last winter make the house spicy with their crackling. The wind may howl outside, but then I think of Hal Borland saying, "The earth has its own pulse and rhythm and the wise and fortunate man leans with the wind." This is a profound philosophy to live by, but Hal is a wise man.

For me, April is a time of remembering, for winter is past, and spring slipping down the hill past the dogtooth violets. It is a time to remember the friends who love us any season, a time to know again that love and loyalty and faith and hope are as certain as that the budded lilacs will burst into bloom in their time. The miracle recurs.

The old house settles and sighs. Jill cracks walnuts for the Irish because if she cracks her own, she might swallow a shell. Holly purely loves walnuts so Jill cracks and cracks. Jonquil takes a dim view of walnuts but wishes Jill would pop a little corn over those clean embers. Teddy sleeps on the couch with one ear up, as if he might take flight any minute. Sister is small in her warm chair.

The peepers are caroling away in the swamp, and this is the sweetest music of all. Clear and hopeful and faintly sad, the peepers renew the promise of summer to come.

As I look out at the chilly moonlit night, I can see the neighbors' lights far down the road. And I like to think we are all neighbors, shining our lights into the dark.

Good night, April, never forsake us, I say, for ■ world needs April! END

RECOVERING FROM A POOR START

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

She was becomingly dressed and strikingly pretty, this bride of twenty-two. Intelligent and well educated, she was the only daughter of indulgent, well-to-do parents. But despite her background and advantages, she managed to get herself into "an incredible mess" in only four months of marriage.

Here is her story, in her own words, but condensed from several conferences:

"My husband, Bill, is a year older than I. We started dating casually five years ago, while we were still in high school. Then we went steady two more years, and were engaged our last two years in college.

"We got along together wonderfully well. Everybody likes Bill. He's brilliant, hard-working and completely reliable. I never doubted my love for him. But being engaged and in love for so long isn't easy, and last spring we consummated our love. It was beautiful and satisfying, but I never felt we'd done right. I wanted to be married right after graduation, but my parents persuaded me to wait till fall, until Bill returned from a special job-training course.

"I was lonely and restless, seeing Bill only weekends, but I didn't go out except with other girls until September. Then I met Jay, a friend of ours from college, at a drinking party. Half as a joke, he talked me into a movie date later in the week. We never got to the movies. We had a wonderful evening, just talking over a drink or two, and we felt completely at home together. We ended by necking, and I was terrifically stimulated by it.

"I was upset, but Jay said we were both lonely, and I gave in. We had more dates, and more necking. My moral standards collapsed, and we became inseparable.

"Jay wanted me to break the engagement, but I couldn't. I decided I loved them both. A week before the wedding, I told Bill I'd spent the last month falling in love with somebody else, but I didn't tell him how serious it was. Bill said I was just mixed up, and he'd take the chance.

"Jay was an usher at the wedding, and even at the rehearsal he tried to get me to call it off.

"On our honeymoon, Bill and I got along as well as ever, but the old adoring love didn't come back. When we came home, I found myself thinking of Jay, and I wrote him pouring out my feelings. He answered the same way. Before long we were planning to meet when Bill was out of town.

"Since then we've spent several miserable weekends together, trying to decide what to do. There's no happiness for me in being with Jay, but I can't get him out of my mind when we're apart.

"Finally, last week I broke down and told Bill the whole story. He was terribly hurt, of course, but he thinks my feeling for Jay is temporary, and mostly physical. He loves me and wants me to give our marriage a chance.

"I don't want a divorce. I think I do love Bill, but I can't forget the Jay world. In a month Bill leaves for his new job assignment. Should I leave until then to try to get my feelings straightened out?"

About all I could tell Carolyn in our first interview was that we would try to help her work out her problem. I did add that no marriage should be abandoned without an honest trial of at least six months. She left, apparently feeling somewhat better, and taking with her three tests to fill out

When she came back four days later, she was quieter and more self-possessed. She handed me her tests, saying, "My answers seem contradictory. It's perplexing, but I do consider my marriage happy in spite of the conflicts. I'm happy and well satisfied with Bill whenever I can stop thinking of Jay.

"Bill is a better husband for me than Jay could ever be. He has more strength, logic, calm. But it's easy to forgive Jay because his faults are the same as mine. I can't stop my love for him from welling up in my mind. I certainly hope you can help me find the answers."

We discussed at length her reasons for confessing to Bill, the reasons why he would be the better husband, the advice her parents would offer if consulted. (They haven't been.) Finally I asked her how she would advise a young wife involved in a similar difficulty.

This seemed to give her a new point of view. She thought it over in silence for several minutes, then said, "I'd tell her to stick by her husband if he was willing to trust her never to see or write the other man again."

That is what she has resolved to do. At this point, after two more conferences with her and one with Bill, I am hopeful that they can build a solid marriage with happiness and fulfillment for both, despite the distressing start. If so, much of the credit will be due Bill. He has displayed perception, generosity of spirit and a maturity far beyond his years.

Leaving, he said to me, "As I understand it, a lot of marriages run into this kind of trouble sooner or later. If it had to happen to us, maybe we'll stand a better chance because we got it over early."

Why did it have to happen to them—why did a girl like Carolyn get involved in this "incredible mess"? Basically, of course, the answer lies in her own traits of character and personality. Her tests and her behavior show that she is impulsive, immature, inclined to live for the moment. Though her parents indulged her in material ways, they did not establish a close, confidential relationship with her. Her need for acceptance and companionship is acute. Not knowing what she wants from life, she has been unable to face up to its responsibilities.

However, her recent behavior and attitude reveal new strength. She has displayed courage, intelligence and integrity. In facing up to her weaknesses, she has developed a new maturity. In determining to stick by her marriage, she shows the resolution and the respect for principle which are vital if the marriage contract is to be meaningful.

Under other circumstances, Carolyn's weaknesses might never have betrayed her. Delaying the marriage until October was unnecessary and unwise. The resulting separation from Bill imposed an undue emotional strain. Finally, after experiencing the sexual relationship with Bill, Carolyn was undoubtedly more easily aroused sexually, and less restrained by her own standards of conduct. In short, Jay came along when she was most susceptible, and her inner resources weren't adequate to protect her.

I can reasonably hope that Carolyn's story will have a happy ending. But another girl, less fortunate and less discriminating in her choice of a husband, is not likely to fare so well. Perhaps this unhappy chapter in Carolyn's life will help some other engaged girl—and her parents—to avoid a similar mistake.

DO YOU AGREE?

When is the danger of getting a divorce greatest?

More than one fourth of all divorces take place within the first three years of marriage. This is the period when the happiness of marriage is largely determined.

ASK YOURSELF:

Does He Admire Me?

Half the questions below concern your personal traits, half the way you actually behave. Both affect your husband's regard for you. Based on what you know about yourself, and what you believe your husband feels about you, check the questions below that you think he would answer "Yes."

Does Your Husband Believe That You Are:

1. Usually cheerful and good-humored?
2. Considerate and unselfish toward him?
3. Sensible and emotionally stable?
4. Understanding of his feelings?
5. Trustworthy and dependable?
6. Willing to show your affection?
7. Happy in being his wife?

Does He Believe That You:

8. Confide fully in him?
9. Spend money wisely?
10. Choose clothes with him in mind?
11. Behave well in public?
12. Co-operate when he makes suggestions?
13. Plan meals for his taste?
14. Love him deeply and wholeheartedly?

The young wife whose story is told above would have scored very poorly on this test! The happy, well-adjusted wife checks eleven or more of these questions to indicate "Yes"; the average wife, nine. But since personality characteristics are dynamic and can be modified, why be satisfied with any negative answers? If you want your husband's admiration, make a conscious effort to deserve it.

"I want to ask you a very important question, Marione, provided you don't rush out and quit your job."

WANT TO SAVE 10 per cent OF YOUR PAY?

...t do? Then here is how to do it: First, ...w down the amount of take-home pay ...ceive each payday. Let's assume your ...a' is 10 per cent of your income, although ...re more or less than that; the exact g... doesn' matter.

...you've ...en to save, you undoubtdly ha...ve something specific in mind. Below ...o sever a divi... hat are often spoken of ... "savi... Check the one you're thinking bout. If mo... than one, number them one, wo, three, in orde... of urgency or preference.

- ☐ Building a cash fund for emergencies.
- ☐ Investing to get additional income.
- ☐ Acquiring the "thrift habit."
- ☐ Providing for retirement or old age.
- ☐ Reducing one set of expenditures in order to increase others.
- ☐ Accumulating funds for a specific short-range purchase—a car or new sofa, for example.
- ☐ Accumulating funds for a specific long-range purchase—a home or college education.

Now your objective is defined ■ bit more early. You'll have uses for this clarification s you read further.

Are you sure you're not already doing ■ ood bit of saving toward an objective without realizing it? For example, mortgage payents, pension contributions, insurance cash alues and Social Security add up to quite a it of old-age savings. Installment payments re the equivalent of savings for ■ near-ture purchase; when you've finished the ayments, you can probably divert the same mount of money to another purchase.

How much more do you want to be savg? Don't just pick an amount out of the r. Base the figure on your objective, and he length of time in which you want to each it. Take the size and nature of your present savings into account. And be conservative; don't aim for too big an increase all at once or one that's all out of proportion to your income.

Now, the odds are overwhelming that your inability to save is not due to a lack of money.

People making $7500 ■ year are just as quick to complain that they haven't enough money as people making $2500 are. The $10,000 family is as certain it hasn't ■ cent to spare as the $5000 family is. The $3600 couple are scornful of the troubles of their $6000 neighbors—"Why, if we had that much, we'd be on easy street." The $6000 people don't see it that way. They do think it ridiculous, however, that anyone could feel pinched at $9000. And so on up the line.

Put it this way: Unless your income is at ■ bare subsistence level, there are plenty of people who live on less than you do. You're entitled to get mad at being told such a thing. But if you want to dissect this saving problem right down to the bare core, it's essential to realize that fact.

You can't divorce saving from spending and living. Saving is ■ form of choosing how to spend your money. What's involved is your whole way of living. Against your savings objective you've got to weigh the way you dress, the parties you give, the things you and your children eat, the vacations you take, the place you live, the books you read, the way you get to work, what you have for lunch, the furnishing of your home, the things you like to do for family fun and relaxation.

Examine and discuss your spending item by item.

FOOD. You may as well start here because food is a popular target in budget cutting, and it's a sizable item.

Check over all your food-buying and eating habits. Be sure you're not falling into the trap of economizing on the main dishes and losing all the saving on expensive desserts and side dishes. Look for any extras and more costly foods that you might skip. Shop the grocery ads for the day's bargains (but don't make the mistake of using 25 cents' worth of gas in driving across town to save a dime). Don't forget the food money that goes for snacks and between-meal eating. Learn to concentrate on the foods that are in season and cheap. Work hard with the cookbooks and homemaking columns to learn the budget dishes, the cheap foods, the short cuts.

In brief: Learn all you can about smart shopping. Take nothing for granted. Experiment. Use your ingenuity. And watch those percentages.

That last paragraph is an equally good guide for your explorations on all the other items. But here are a few special pointers:

CLOTHING. Learn the tricks of wardrobe planning to make as few clothing items as possible cover as many clothing needs as possible. Watch for savings opportunities through home sewing. Put your emphasis on the practical and serviceable. Buy children's clothes for the longest possible use—hard-wearing stuff that's built for expansion and hand-me-down service. Store out-of-season clothes carefully.

HOUSEHOLD. Can you economize on laundry? Watch your habits with the gas and electricity and telephone. See whether dry-cleaning bills could be cut by giving business and dress-up clothes an absolute minimum of wear.

TRANSPORTATION: Make sure a little walking wouldn't chip a good percentage off your carfare budget. If you have a car, keep track of how much unessential driving you do. If you drive to work, see whether it would be cheaper or costlier to take public transportation. Can parking charges be reduced with more neighborhood shopping?

If you still want to save and are ready to tackle the job, do these things:

- Think always in terms of what you want your savings to buy. Make your objective just as real and close and alive as you can.
- Discuss your goals with your wife or husband. Unless there's agreement or satisfactory compromise, there's going to be trouble.
- Compare the goal of this deferred spending constantly and in detail with current spending. Compare the worth to you of what you can buy later with the worth of what you can buy now.
- Remember that it's quite possible to make yourself miserable by trying to save. Whatever your objective, that's not it. Don't take all the enjoyment out of your day-to-day living. But at the same time don't mistake self-indulgence for mature decision. If you're honest with yourself, you'll know the difference.

Finally, don't feel guilty or upset if, after all this, you can't justify to yourself the sacrifices necessary to increase your savings. It's your money and your life. If you really want to take a chance and let the future take care of itself, if you enjoy what you've got more than what you could gain by saving—that's your business. Just be sure you know what you're doing.

Remember that none of these is being shoved down your throat. So don't complain: "But a new hat now and then is the only thing that keeps me going!" Or "It's not worth all the trouble to watch those pennies." Or "I like to smoke!"

You may be absolutely right. If you have combed and recombed every item in your budget and found nothing that you are able or willing to give up for the sake of saving—then sit back and count your blessings. Your money is already doing the things that you most want it to do. And it isn't everybody who can say that. END

Journal ABOUT TOWN

Gossip about people you know, editors you like, and what goes on in New York

FIFTY YEARS AGO IN THE JOURNAL

April, 1907, saw the first all-steel Pullman sleeping cars and Elinor Glyn wrote the shocker Three Weeks. Mme. Schumann-Heink electrified Americans, singing The Rosary, while ballroom music set every foot tapping: "Waltz me around again, Willie, around, around, around; the music is dreamy, it's peachy and creamy; oh, don't let my feet touch the ground!"

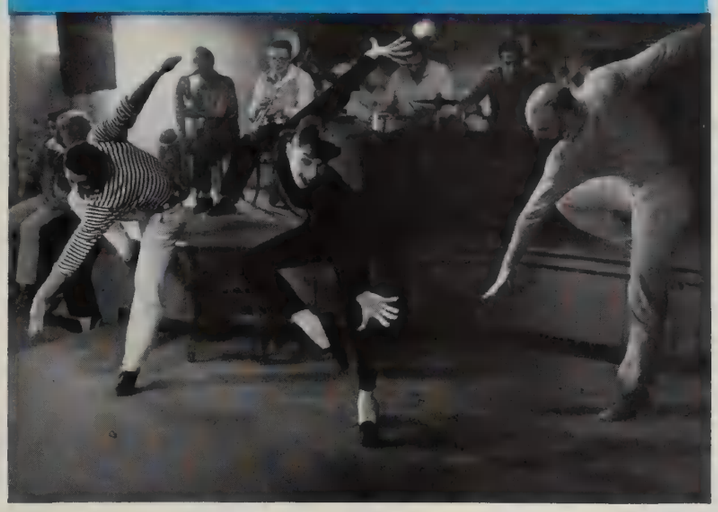
Editor Bok selects the questions most asked JOURNAL editors in April, 1907: "Who is the greatest actor?" "What is the greatest book ever written?" "What is the greatest painting?" and replies, "To such questions, no intelligent answer can be given."

In the April, 1907, issue, Frank Lloyd Wright offers plans for a $5000 four-bedroom fireproof house. Of concrete construction with overhanging eaves, with "no attic, no butler's pantry, no back stairway, trimmed of the superfluous," the house looks strikingly modern, even for today.

Concerning the price, Chicago architect Wright apologizes. "In the past six years, from 1901 to 1907, the cost of building has increased 40 per cent."

Beauty note: "The popular idea that each hair on the head is hollow and so bleeds at the end when split unless singed with a hot iron is a fallacy."

Entertaining: "A munching party is a dinner party at which guests chew every mouthful thirty-two times before swallowing."



"Are sandwiches eaten with a fork?" worries Ella. Answers the JOURNAL: "They may be so eaten if one is gloved."

"Is it correct to mail invitations or should they be sent by hand?" "Even the most punctilious now send invitations by post."

"Truth is always coarse, and the vital things of life are crude," remarks the Plain Country Woman concerning giving children the facts of life. "But remember, there is always the great way of looking at things and finding them beautiful."

"Do you consider it a breach of good manners for a young woman to hum under her breath in a public place?" a reader asks. "Simply vulgar," comments the Lady from Philadelphia.

"A steaming-hot mustard foot bath during which one slowly drinks a glass of hot lemonade is beneficial for colds."

BILL AVERY

Audrey Hepburn in song-and-dance number from "Funny Face."

"Last night a real Journal About Town thing happened," Tina Fredericks told us. Seems our picture editor and her husband at the movies unexpectedly found themselves sitting in on a sneak preview of FUNNY FACE, the Audrey Hepburn, Fred Astaire picture that's due about now. Suddenly after the song-and-dance number in the photograph here, the person right next to Tina squealed out so much like Audrey Hepburn on the screen that Tina turned to look, and it was Audrey, with Mel Ferrer giving her a hug of delight. "After that my neck got tired," said Tina, "trying to watch them and the movie too."

Another thing about Funny Face is that in it Fred Astaire, with all his famous flair and nimbleness, portrays the life and activities of the peak-flight fashion photographer Richard Avedon, who has carried out innumerable assignments for Wilhela Cushman and Nora O'Leary. . . . . "Oh, I forgot to tell you," said Tina, "that when the lights went up, there was Dick Avedon sitting right behind us."

We asked three well-known women to write thumbnail accounts to be entitled My First Job. Here are the bare beginnings of each. See if you can guess the names. The first two should be easy.

1. "I lost my first job and cried bitterly over it. I had been working as a waitress for 40 cents an hour to see me through senior year at Cornell. But it was the luckiest thing that ever happened to me. It turned me to my camera."

2. "At twenty-three I was in Pago-Pago with a typewriter, a metal strongbox, notebooks, a baby pillow, a few clothes, $4.50, and the Samoans."

3. "My first job would have been teaching, but I flunked my teachers' exam in English. So I went to work for the Women's Suffrage Movement in Buffalo—a colorful life for a minister's daughter."

See end of page for names.

"Considering that My Fair Lady is probably the best show of this century," Bruce Gould observed, "I suppose we should say something about it on its first anniversary." So here goes—straight from the management. . . . It's sold out for six months ahead, but they expect it to run for five years, so relax. It was all the State Department could do the other day to turn up two tickets for Madame Pandit. Out-of-town businessmen's visits here are determined by the dates they can get seats. The morning we spoke to the management they'd already had phone calls for reservations from Constantinople, Rome and Caracas. People who never heard of Shaw's play Pygmalion, from which the musical was made, will now pay $60 a pair to speculators for tickets to tonight's performance. Play will open in March, 1958, at the Drury Lane in London. Until then the record (a honey!) cannot be sold in England. So anybody who brings one from here is practically invited to Buckingham Palace. . . . "All right," we said, "now what's the best you can do for us?" "Well," pondered the management, after considerable huffing and puffing, "what about Monday evening, October 14?"

We went down with Eileen Sharpe to the lobby of the little movie house around the corner, where we met Eileen's photographer friend, Erica Anderson, who had just finished making the film called ALBERT SCHWEITZER that was going on for the first time in a few minutes. "You'll see, he has the eyes of an antelope," Erica whispered as we sat down in the dark. He had. He also had the mustaches of a mystic, and the stride of a grenadier as he moved among the adoring natives of steaming equatorial Africa, where this marvelous old man of eighty-two maintains his hospital in Lambaréné. Erica's picture that she was five years making is an intimate, gripping picture of one of the earth's greatest living inhabitants. "How did you persuade him to let you make it?" we asked. . . . "I kept on moaning what a wild-goose chase to Africa it would be if he didn't let me; until finally he sighed, 'Oh, all right—I'm the wild goose—and now I guess you've got me.'"

If you want to see how JOURNAL editors make sure they're right before they go ahead, take a look here in the beauty department down the hall where Dawn Norman reads out the exercises she'll be using in her copy while beauty assistant Dottie Robinson and beauty secretary Carol Phelps follow Dawn's words from the big black exercise mat on the floor. In this way Dawn's words can be made so clear that no pictures are needed to explain them. However, our own words here we thought could use a picture. So here it is.

The beginnings of the little field-flower helmet on this month's cover go back to a beautiful day last summer in Paris when Mr. John, American painter and designer, bought a handful of fresh flowers from one of the flower girls at the Madeleine, rushed back to his hotel to put it on canvas. When designing his junior collection for spring, back in New York, this painting was his inspiration. Wilhela Cushman photographed it on Gloria Shearer *because she thinks almost every woman would like to wear it the first spring day. David's New Girl

It started at Thanksgiving. And from then till June, everything went to pieces— David's heart, the furnace, and all Mrs. Blair's careful plans.

By ANN HEAD

ILLUSTRATED BY JOE BOWLER

THANKSGIVING, Tuesday

The letter from David came this morning, but I didn't have a chance to read it until lunchtime. It's been a cold gray day and the furnace, which at best keeps this drafty, high-ceilinged old house at a low sixty-five, groaned to a full stop sometime during the night. I tumbled the twins out of bed at the crack of dawn to get fires going in the fireplaces and waited until a decent seven-thirty before calling Mr. Dunstable, the furnaceman. My only reward for this was the grumpy query, was we on daylight-saving time up there? Gordon, still snugly in bed with no idea of the crisis awaiting him, groaned and mumbled did I have to telephone my boy friends so early in the morning? I said early in the morning was the only time I could catch them in bed. Mr. Dunstable, thoroughly aroused, said he didn't think he'd understood me rightly. I assured him he hadn't and he promised he'd be around as soon as he'd been to the Uptons'. The Uptons, he said, were having duct trouble. By this time Gordon was out of bed and glaring at me and asking why hadn't I reminded him to turn the thermostat up the night before?

Downstairs it was better. The boys had got fires going in the dining room and in the east living room, and a small kerosene stove was set up in the middle of the kitchen. I put on the coffee percolator first of all, daring it to take more than five minutes, and wondered if atomic energy would someday make it in two.

David moaned, "Well, how did she take it? What did she say?"

"Say?" said Angela. "Why, just what any mother would say on the happiest day of her daughter's life."

Amanda, looking warm as toast in a cotton eyelet blouse, floated in to say she couldn't see what all the fuss was about. In the old days, she said with the authority of one who has lived in this tired old world for seventeen years, the houses were always heated with fireplaces and no one complained. In the old days, I rejoined, flipping eggs, bacon and sausage onto a platter, there were servants falling all over one another to keep those fires going. In the old days, Tuck, the studious twin, said, the Gulf Stream was farther south—"Isn't that right, mom?" I said I wasn't sure, that actually I thought it had something to do with the glaciers in the Arctic melting or not melting, and Johnny, the practical twin, screamed that the toast was burning. It was.

Gordon, who usually stays to have a peaceful second cup of coffee with me after the children have gone to school, mumbled something about broccoli and a possible freeze and departed abruptly for the warm snug haven of the farm's field office. I felt cheated but poured myself another cup anyway, only to have Mr. Dunstable and the postman arrive at back and front doors simultaneously. The postman had a special-delivery letter from David, who should know better, as the only "special delivery" the mail in Bromley gets is that the postman rings the doorbell and gives it to you first before reaching into his bag for the lesser communications. I hoped all this ostentation didn't mean that David wasn't coming home for Thanksgiving, but was rather afraid that it did, as his last letter had dwelt heavily on the pressures of imminent exams and "miscellaneous" expenses, which seem to be the only expenses David ever has. However, Mr. Dunstable was making a tomtom of the back door so I reluctantly tossed the mail on the hall table and dashed to the kitchen to make the rescuing chieftain welcome.

Mr. Dunstable, for my money—and he's had his share of it—is the most eligible bachelor in Bromley. He is all the things a woman doesn't look for in a husband until she's been married for ten years. He can fix anything from an aged dying furnace to a brand-new automatically controlled oven, neurotic from too much inbreeding. He is a doctor of household devices, a philosopher of the mechanical age, and for all his unshaven mien, his beat-up nose and air of having just dropped in on his way home from a convivial evening of poker and schmaltz, the best company I know with the exception of Gordon when he's had a good crop.

The trouble with the furnace, Mr. Dunstable said, without looking at it, was that we needed a new one. Dimly I remembered a small item in the Bromley Gazette to the effect that Mr. Dunstable had recently been made the territorial agent for a new air-blowing, air-receiving (whatever that means) furnace. I smiled regretfully and asked him if he would join me in a cup of coffee. He said he'd already had two at Uptons' but it'd been weak as water and promptly made himself comfortable in Gordon's armchair, hitching it closer to the stove as he did so.

"The trouble with the world today," he said, rolling the hot coffee around on his tongue, "is that people are afraid of change. People," he said, "used to seek change and that's how this country was founded and the great wide West opened up. Now," he said dolefully, "they fight change like it was an enemy. Take that old furnace of yours," he said, and I knew with sickening certainty that before he'd finished his coffee I'd be looking at folders and price lists and that before he left I'd be signing papers and I wondered how on earth I'd ever explain to Gordon that we'd just bought a new furnace when what we needed was new slip covers for the west living room. The telephone rang. I escaped.

It was Sally Dunn, David's girl; or at least the one he'd known the longest—the others come and go with the seasons. All of us, with the possible exception of David, have been sure that someday he and Sally —— This morning she sounded faraway and wistful. Had I heard from David recently and was he coming home for Thanksgiving

Hank & Julie and DYLAN

By NELIA GARDNER WHITE

At the rear of the dean's house was a basement room, which had an outside entrance down three steps, and in which was domiciled each year a student who took care of the dean's furnace, shoveled his walks and mowed his lawn. The room, the dean often said, was one of his few good investments. This year it was occupied by a junior named Henry Woodridge, but called Hank. It was a plain, snug room, with a pine dresser, unpainted pine bookshelves, a cot, a card table, two chairs. It also had a gas plate on which the tenant could cook if he chose. Henry Woodridge so chose, for he was an exceedingly poor young man. Also, he was an exceedingly appealing young man, with a quick smile, thoughtful dark eyes and untidy hair.

On an afternoon in late January, a girl came down the three steps, knocked on the door impatiently. She had on a short plaid skirt, a pillbox of a plaid hat with a strap under the chin, long woolen socks and a green jacket. Over her shoulder were slung skating shoes. Her face was impudent, charming, young. She stood there knocking for only an instant, then she opened the door, stepped inside. Hank was sitting at the card table, his back to her, working away at something or other.

The girl—she was Julie Lankton, the dean's daughter—stood there an instant, scowling at Hank's back, then said humbly, though she was not at all humble, "I thought you might like to go skating."

Hank didn't turn. "Would you hand me the atlas—under the dictionary there at the bottom?" he asked absently yet peremptorily.

Obediently she went to the shelf, bent, drew out the atlas and brought it over to the table.

"Find Wales," Hank said.

She pulled off mittens, fumbled through the atlas till she found Wales. He simply drew the book from her and studied the map.

"They'll do," he said suddenly. "Snowdon—and can you read that one looking out on the bay? Is it Tregaron? And is it really in the mountains?"

"No, it's nearer the shore. What are you doing?"

"It'll have to do till I find a bigger map. I'm writing a poem, so will you run along and leave me to it?"

"I thought you might go skating with me."

"Well, I wouldn't. I've work to do."

She pulled on her mittens, not looking at him. "What's the poem about?" she asked.

"Dylan Thomas," he said shortly.

"You could read it to me."

"In the middle? Julie, stop pursuing me—run along!"

"Pursuing you, indeed! I just thought you'd do better than nobody to skate with. I'm more fun than Dylan Thomas—he's dead."

"Oh, is he? He's not dead to me. Even buried, he's got more life in his little finger than you'll ever have, my girl!"

"He drank," she said flatly.

"He sure did—great gulps of life!"

"I thought you were a mathematician."

"So I am—so I am. In my spare time I can be a poet, can't I? You are interrupting, Julie."

She looked down, looked away, but did not move. Then she murmured, "I can read upside down. 'Braced against air' indeed!"

"Well, he was. You know, Julie, I think this is going to be a good poem. I really do. Listen:

> "This man was a giant.
> With one foot on Snowdon and one on Tregaron
> He stood, braced against air.
> And words poured forth, mighty as thunder,
> Sweet as honey, sharp as split rock,
> And the waves beat to the rhythm of the words
> And children ran down the hills to listen.
> The heron lifted to him from the marshes,
> The gulls from the sea,
> And the fish rose up from the waters to hear,
> And cherubim and seraphim came down from God
> And ——

"That's as far as I've got. I think it's pretty good."

"What's it got to do with differential calculus?" she asked rudely.

"Nothing. Everything. You don't like it? I thought you wouldn't."

"Words is right. He just used a lot of words with nothing in them but a big sound. I can just see him standing up there with a big demijohn or whatever you call it, shouting words—and taking huge swallows of gin in between!"

"You are a prude, Julie," he told her. "What if he did drink? And the words say something all right, if you just listen. You never listen to anyone but yourself. . . . Stop snapping that strap!"

"I listen to you," she said, giving the strap another final snap under her chin. "Well, I'll run along, though you urge me so to stay. But you'll be sorry someday—you really will, Hank. Dylan's dead."

Julie said.
"I just want you to be human once in a while."

Here was a nightmare which Rosalie had never dreamed of—her husband a stranger . . . a stranger her suitor.

THE DURABLE

By HOWARD SWIGGETT

SYNOPSIS OF PART I On New Year's Eve Edward Rutledge, chairman of Continental Industries Corporation, sat worrying about Stephen Lowry, whom he had just hired as vice-president in charge of foreign operations. Lowry had recently returned to New York after years of Government service abroad; he had high qualifications—but Rutledge detected a disturbing levity in Lowry's attitude toward C.I.C., doubted the "suitability" of his beautiful foreign wife, felt anxious about Lowry's ne'er-do-well brother "Dolly." That same night, the Lowrys were celebrating with Stephen's boyhood friend Jim Peale, and his wife Evelyn. Stephen thought Jim seemed changed and tense; Rosalie sensed Evelyn's antagonism and unhappiness. Later, alone, the Lowrys recalled their own strange wartime courtship. Stephen, sent on a mission to Norway by Colonel Channing, had discovered, among rough Resistance officers, a lovely Estonian girl in fisherman's clothes. He learned she was Rosalie Lainvee, who had joined the Resistance after invading Russians had killed or captured her whole family. Unwilling to leave Norway without her, Stephen persuaded Rosalie to return to London as his wife. Now, after years of happiness in Europe, they had returned to the United States. Rosalie, facing a new life, was uneasy. Would Stephen's friends accept her? Could she learn to be like American women? Might not Stephen's new, demanding job threaten the close companionship they shared?

Lowry did not find his job to be a "hard" one that winter. The heavy responsibilities carried power with them, and its exercise was stimulating rather than wearing. If he had any doubt as to the rightness of any decision, there was a group of experienced, friendly men to consult with. He was always aware of the strong understructure of the corporation supporting him. The fact that profit over the long pull was in effect the sole objective greatly simplified decisions. There were no opposition politicians, no minorities, no special interests to contend with as there had been in Europe. His respect for American industry increased.

Outwardly his colleagues, Curtis, Hewitt and Evans, had a certain corporate uniformity of optimism, team spirit and strict attention to business. Curtis, personally the most attractive, was the least forceful and seemed the least ambitious. Evans, dependable and highly skilled, was a little overshadowed by both Peale and Hewitt.

The latter had the gift of "talking business" in equally absorbed fashion with Mr. Rutledge, an officer of a subsidiary or a small customer whom he might overhear arguing with a salesman that a spare-parts delivery was not properly scaled. Lowry got an early respect for his knowledge of the business, his devotion to it and his real ability. It surprised him to find certain less amiable qualities present as well, one a form of talebearing. As a friendly mentor, Hewitt would say, "I happened to see Rex Thurston the other day and he told me you were old friends. Of course I've known Rex all my life. There's just one thing I think I ought to mention. I do think from something he said that he may feel you're expecting a good deal of your friends. It was about that situation in Rhodesia where you asked him to write you ——"

"What is this?" Lowry said in annoyance. "I met him in the subway and he told me ——"

"Now, don't go back to Rex about it. He likes you, make no mistake about that; do anything for you."

"Look, it's not a question of his doing anything for me. I ——"

"Steve, I only told you this as a friend. If I've said the wrong thing, forget it. I am always glad if people tell me ——"

Another pattern, equally annoying, had to do with something he had "been given to understand" would not be announced for some months to come but when it did would very likely cause a major row. He was not at liberty to say what it was and actually all he could say was wait and see. However, he was making his own plans. To the timid or unwary this was likely to suggest salary cuts.

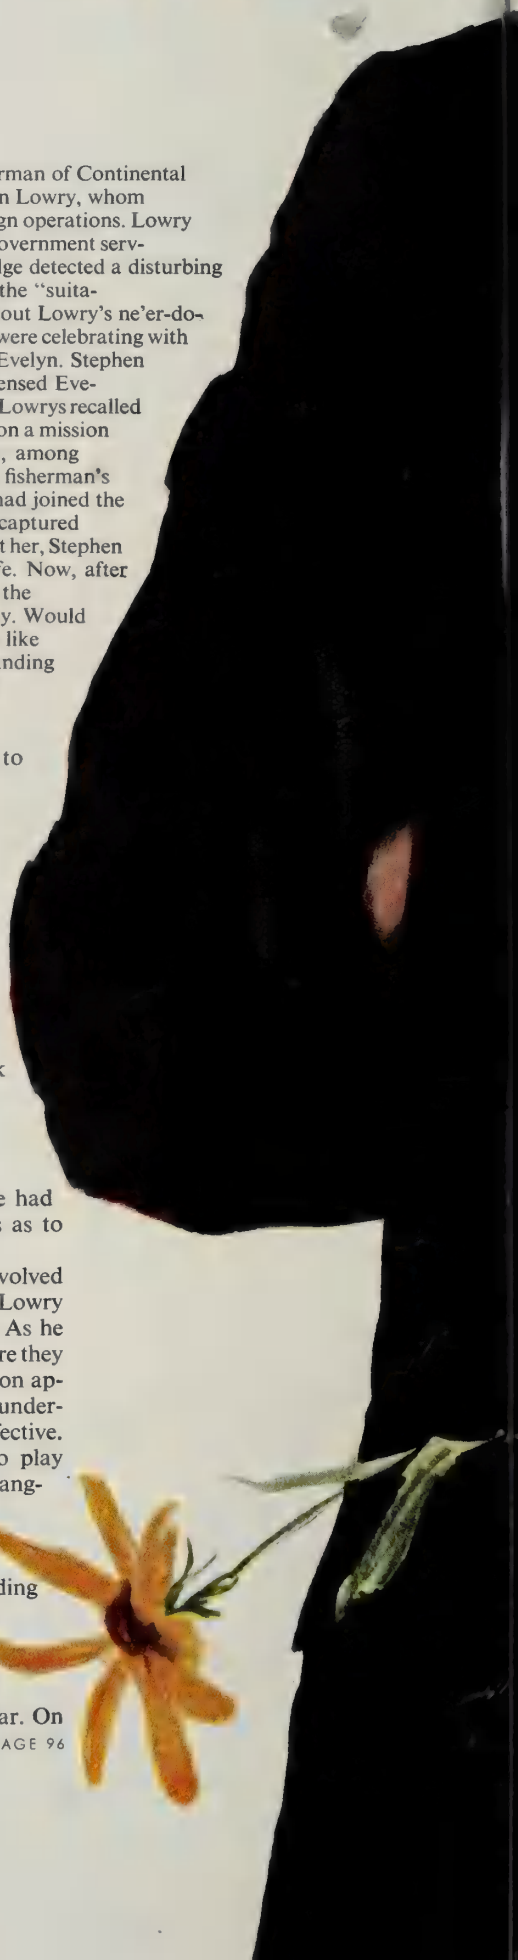
As to Peale, Lowry found himself more and more puzzled. Consecrated and critical at once as his manner was, Lowry felt a sense of insecurity about him which nothing in his position seemed to warrant. Peale would break off a lecture to him on what Lowry should do, to ask, "Steve, you would say, wouldn't you, that Rutledge has an unusual respect for what I think and the way I do things?"

"Yes, why?" Lowry would answer.

"I sometimes wish it wasn't so marked. I think it gets under Calvin's skin."

Lowry did not believe for a moment that Peale had said what he meant, but he was equally at a loss as to what he did mean.

But though the distracting worries and rivalries involved in getting ahead bothered and even bored him, Lowry realized that most men seemed to thrive on them. As he more or less unconsciously studied them, he was aware they were also studying him. Rutledge and Thomas Johnson appeared well pleased with him. In effect they let him understand that they found him sound, agreeable and effective.



Late one afternoon Peale called to ask him to play squash, and as they strode along 53rd Street, exchanging the banter of earlier days, some of the old close comradeship seemed to come back.

Both played well in different styles—Peale holding the mid-court with his still-terrific volleying, and Lowry, out of practice, relying on round-the-court angle shots; he lost three straight games.

After a shower and rubdown they went to the bar. On the way to a corner

Peter Putnam's descent toward death began when he asked himself, "What have I to live for?" He discovered the answer— at the price of permanent blindness.

By PETER PUTNAM

There is a novelty you can buy for children, called a surprise ball. It is made of a single long strip of paper, wrapped round and round, and as you unwind it you discover the surprises concealed within—charms, jacks, candy, a marble and, at the end, a paper party hat. It is a little like that with writing your autobiography. You grab the projecting end of your memory and unwind your way into the past. When you write it, of course, the end becomes the beginning, and, in this case, it is a beginning I had never intended to write. The thing I had not wanted to write was the fact that the "accident" which blinded and very nearly killed me was not an accident at all, but an attempt at suicide.

Even after all these years, I have been unable to form a satisfactory diagnosis of my illness. I can but hope to give some glimpses into the symptoms which led to the violence of the climax. "Climax" is the wrong word. It was as if the landscape of my life had tilted up, and I began to slide, first without knowing and then without caring, until I slipped over the edge.

Throughout my adolescence the prevailing drift of my past seemed to be carrying me toward West Point. Both my father and my brother-in-law were Regular Army officers, and in my final year at the Hill School it was the Army which I "chose." When I wrote my father of the choice, I thought the matter settled. I was, therefore, disconcerted by his answer. With a candor which must have been difficult, he assessed his own experience and concluded by advising me not to subject myself to the frustrations and disappointments of military life.

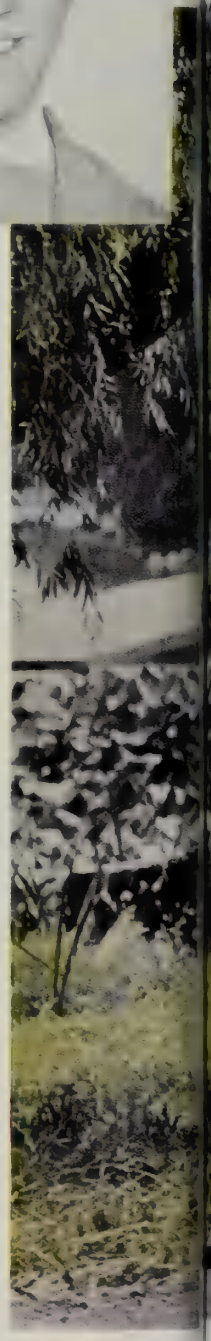
CAST OFF THE DARKNESS
is soon to be published in book form by Harcourt, Brace & Co.

With West Point ruled out, I quailed before the necessity of a second choice. I did not choose. I slid. Because my uncles had been Princeton men, because most of my friends at the Hill were bound for Princeton, I found myself, in the fall of 1938, carrying my bags up from the station and to the campus that was to be a fairyland and hell to me for years to come.

In my freshman year I had a wonderful time. I attended all the football games, about three quarters of my classes and nearly half the movies. I was stimulated by the contacts with new friends and new ideas. I learned something about drinking, jazz and what the college man should wear. I learned a good deal about ancient and medieval architecture and a smattering of European history. I learned nothing at all about studying. I loved listening to lectures, but as the weeks rolled by I paid less and less attention to my preparation. With a highly developed talent for cramming and writing examinations, I managed to get by with every appearance of credit. At the end of the year, my marks averaged out to honor grades.



For the majority of boys, college implies a loosening of all the ties with home and family, but for me this had a special impact. One consequence of the nomadic existence of Army life had been to magnify the importance of these ties. Moving from place to place, changing schools and friends every two or three years, I had always felt myself removed from my contemporaries. My connections with them lacked permanence. With my family, it was different; it was my single social constant. I was totally absorbed in my relations with my parents and my grandfather, my brother, sister, cousins, aunts and uncles. Two years at the Hill had begun to redress the social balance, but Princeton tipped the scales the other way. I had withdrawn from my family, and for the first time felt myself as fully at home in my surroundings as my fellow classmates. Princeton was my home town, my whole world. I reveled in the sense of group belonging. Nevertheless, the permanence was more apparent than real; beyond Princeton, there was nothing.

My failure to form a concrete vision of the future was a product of both an inferiority complex and an extraordinary conceit. Above a gnawing sense of inner weakness, I cherished dreams of future greatness. I felt I had the mental tools to scale a dozen different heights. My education had shown aptitudes in many fields in both the arts and sciences. But choice was that of which I was incapable.

My efforts at the Hill had brought me highest honors in the college-board examinations in both chemistry and mathematics, and I might well have concluded that my wisest course was to pursue my study of the sciences. Instead, I sought self-conscious versatility. I cut the sciences completely from my course of study, in order to immerse myself in the liberal arts. But I did not immerse myself, I never got below their surface meanings. In June I discovered that I had narrowly missed qualifying for a special program of study reserved for exceptional students, and with a stab of pain I realized how much I had needed the opportunity and challenge of that program. Little by little my potentialities, the mental tools I had so prized, were slipping from my grasp.

That summer I did not seek the job my conscience was demanding. Instead, two classmates—Bobby Harvey and Gordy Bent—and to town

A short trip

By WILL STANTON

It was along about ten in the morning when Perly drove into the yard. He wanted to know if I'd like to go to town with him. I didn't see why not. We only get into town every so often. Sometimes when the weather's bad we don't even go then.

So we started off. The car bounced over a rock at the edge of the drive and Perly swore.

"I'm going to take that rock out of there," I told him, "any day now."

"I love the rocks and rills," Perly said. "Looks like that's about all I have left. Elvira's made up her mind to marry the banker. I'm about to lose my baby."

Well, Elvira stood a good five foot seven and weighed around 125 or 130. She was a real snappy-looking girl with red hair, but no baby to my mind—anyhow not to get sentimental about it. Of course there was just the two of them and she'd been keeping house for him since she was fourteen or thereabouts. Still, you don't expect a girl to stay around the house forever. She wants to get out and have a family, even if she's got to marry a banker.

"So she's turned Anse down for good," I said.

"I gave her every argument I could think of," Perly said, "but it wasn't any good. 'You know anybody else with three hundred and sixty acres of prime farming land?' I asked her. No, she didn't and didn't want to."

"Anse has got a good farm," I said, "and no mistake. There's pheasant back toward his west boundary like nowheres else in the county, and squirrel ——"

"Yes," he said, "and rabbits and quail. A man could live pretty high on that place and never plant a seed. But Elvira has got this bullheaded streak to her."

"You take fish," I said. "There's a place where his back pasture slopes down to the river—I've seen bass there ——"

"You don't have to tell me. Tell Elvira." There was a fellow driving an Essex in front of us and Perly gunned the engine to pass him. He couldn't make it so he honked the horn a couple of times and pulled back over. "The trouble with Elvira is she hasn't got any notion of marrying a man that wears boots all the time. Oh no. She wants a man with some refinement to him and culture. The finest pack of hounds in the county be hanged."

"This fellow with the culture," I said, "no doubt that would be this Albert at the bank."

"No doubt," he said. "I told Elvira—I don't care if he carries a book of Longfellow in his pocket—I don't care if he can whistle every song that Carrie Jacobs Bond ever wrote ——" Perly stopped and snorted.

"What did she say?"

"I don't remember," Perly said. "All I know is no daughter has any business talking up to her father like that. I had a good notion to take a stick to her, only you know what my rheumatism is like in wet weather."

Well, we had been getting a lot of rain. I didn't say anything until we got to the grade crossing. There was some cars lined up waiting for a freight train to go by. Perly stopped about twenty, thirty feet behind the last car. Pretty quick a car pulled up behind us and gave a blast on the horn. Perly picked up a good-sized wrench from the floor. Then he got out and slammed the door.

"Hold on there," I said. "There was something I wanted to ask you."

Perly stood there in the road, tucking in his shirt all around with the wrench in his hand. "You can ask me in a minute." He hunched his shoulders and started toward the rear of the car. I turned around to watch. The fellow in back of us rolled up his window in a hurry. His face had kind of an odd color, either that or he had a green windshield. I couldn't see Perly. In a minute he came back and tossed the wrench on the floor.

"Thought the taillight might be loose," he said. "Take a look out the back window." He started up and drove forward eight or ten feet and slammed on the brakes. The car in back followed right along and slammed on his brakes, and the car in back of him did the same and so on down the line. Six or eight of them.

"Let's try it again," Perly said, and he did and they all did.

"I could lead them across the country that way," he said, "coast to coast." He appeared to be feeling more cheerful.

After the train passed we headed into town. Perly gave a sigh. "An ungrateful child is sharper than a adder's tongue," he said. "Longfellow tells us that. Now that I think of it, her mother was the same way."

Well, Elvira did have a sharp tongue. "I don't see that it matters who she marries," I told him, "you always have hunted and fished Anse's land and he never ran you off before."

"No, and Elvira wasn't married to some penny stacker before neither. I don't mean to say Anse would run me off even now, but if I was his father-in-law I could hunt and fish there and I could run other people off."

"You've been doing that right along," I said.

"That's so," he said, "but if he was my son-in-law I'd have the authority for it. Besides, he'd more than likely let me borrow his hounds from time to time."

"He's got some fine ones," I said. "I wouldn't mind having that blue-tick of his."

"What blue-tick?"

"You're headed for the wrong side of that culvert," I said. "Why, the blue-tick hound he got from Kentucky last week. Paid two hundred dollars for her, they tell me—some kind of a champion, I guess."

"Well now, if that don't take the prize for a ungrateful daughter." Some kid on a bicycle started to pass us. Perly shoved down on the gas pedal and that kid really had to pump to get by us. "Going to marry a banker, is she?" Perly said. "Well, maybe a father still has some rights." He turned into Main Street and parked just down from the bank. The ladies' store where Elvira worked part time was a couple of doors the other way.

Who are America's 10 Richest

If you could do anything you wanted to do, within the bounds of limitless wealth—what would you do, how would you live? Build castles? Help others?
Dance from morn till night? America's millionaires may be able to advise you.

JOSEPH PEW
A famous name in Phila. society; Pew ducks publicity, plays politics.

"After the first hundred million, what the heck?" asked Clint Murchison, discussing his friend and fellow Texan, Sid Richardson. Mr. Murchison is supposed to have $300 million; Mr. Richardson, $700 million. But both know, as do most financial observers, that neither a multimillionaire nor his wife can ever tell exactly how much money they have—after the first hundred million, that is. Holdings are too diffuse, profits too variable to make an assessment of great wealth anything more than an estimate.

Lists of America's richest men change from year to year, and sometimes from month to month. Recently H. L. Hunt and Hugh Roy Cullen, both Texas oilmen, were always included. Hunt, however, has suffered some reverses (dropping him into the dirt-poor, or below-$200-million class) and Cullen has given away 90 per cent of an estimated $350-million fortune to various educational, religious, medical and charitable groups. This leaves him with a mere $35 million, and puts him way out of the running.

Who, according to the best available evidence, are today's ten wealthiest men?

Leading the list is bluff Texas bachelor Sid W. Richardson, with his estimated $700 million. In second place comes that amazing old Florida operator, Arthur Vining Davis, with around $450 million. In third place, with $400 million, is Henry Ford II, president of the Ford Motor Company. Vying for fourth place, with $350 million each, are Joseph Newton Pew, Jr., chairman of the Sun Oil Company of Pennsylvania, and Howard Hughes, aviator, movie maker, perennial squire of beautiful girls, and president of the Hughes Tool Company of Houston, Texas. Next comes Clint Murchison, with $300 million, give or take a few millions. After him is modest Paul Mellon, inheritor of a Pittsburgh steel fortune which now seems to amount to around $250 million. Also competing for Mellon's place, with $250 million each, are the high-living St. Louis brewer, August Busch, owner of the St. Louis Cardinals, and John D. Rockefeller III. Trailing the rest, with a paltry $200 million, is Robert Winship Woodruff, of Georgia, Coca-Cola manufacturer and golfing companion of President Eisenhower.

At first glance these men seem to have little in common. Some inherited their wealth, others made it themselves. Men like Rockefeller and Mellon spend a great deal of time giving it away. Richardson, who at 65 has not yet had time for extensive philanthropy, says, "I'll still be tradin' when they bury me." And Davis, at 89, snaps at reporters, "I work to make money!"

Some of them live in palatial mansions, surrounded with cooks, butlers and gardeners. Others prefer to live in hotels or clubs. Some are women chasers, others have been devotedly married for many years. Some are gentle parents, others are harsh. Some speak in cultivated voices, and find enjoyment in music, art and literature. Others take pride in crudity, and happily let the arts get along without them.

Wide as are these differences, there are some attributes which they share. Few of them, for instance, seem to have had a serious illness—by and large, they are characterized by raw good health. Most of them have what has been called "millionaire vitality"; they hunt, fish, ride, play tennis and golf. (Busch likes nothing better than a warm-up with his own baseball team.) Most of them can work (or have worked in the past) for three days and nights on a problem, without sleeping. Almost all of them are early risers. Woodruff hauls his guests out of bed at dawn every morning to go hunting, and thinks nothing of it.

Most of them are "loners." Without advice, they may gamble millions on a risky financial venture, willing to take victory or defeat on their own. They make up their own minds, and often their decisions lead them on dizzy paths which more timid citizens would not dare to tread. They tend to do without secretaries or elaborate offices, to carry their real business in their hats. (In 1929 the New York Herald Tribune reported that young Rockefeller had visited King Alfonso of Spain, accompanied by "a secretary and a servant." The paper was very quickly informed by a family spokesman that Rockefeller "has never had a secretary or servant." His habits may have changed, but the tendency to keep important matters under his $50 hat remains.)

Every one of them has been described as having "an ability to size up men." All of them are said to possess "vision." Richardson, for instance, kept on prospecting for oil in an area where engineers said there was none. He was right. Woodruff lost money when he sent Cokes to GI's all over the world during World War II—but he correctly foresaw the huge postwar profits which would result when the soft drink's name and fame were carried around the world. Mellon, perhaps the most visionary of all, contributes heavily to preservation of America's trees and wildlife.

Most of them are likable men, admired by their associates and subordinates.

All of them, it might be noted, differ in a number of ways from the Robber Barons who flourished at the end of the nineteenth century. Parties may be lavish, but they are not ostentatious or eccentric; today no one would seat a chimpanzee at the glittering dinner table, nor ask the guests to ride into the banquet room on horseback. Dedicated philanthropy has, more or less, replaced lavish display. The old moguls had yachts—today's dollar prince has a private plane or two. The older gentlemen made no secret of their mistresses; there has rarely been a breath of scandal about most of the newer generation of millionaires.

The most important link, however, seems to be family background and "atmosphere." Some of the men come from families of famous name and wealth, others are said to be "self-made." Yet in a sense, none of them is self-made, for in the background of every life stands a father, pushing his son along. Every one of them had a good heritage in terms of parental strength, foresight and determination. Nine of the ten were personally trained or taught by their fathers, when they first entered the world of real money.

Take Sid Richardson, for instance—America's richest man. (If you stacked his $700 million in silver dollars they would make a tower roughly 276 times higher than Mount Everest.) Sid Williams Richardson was born on April 25, 1891, in Athens, Texas, a town which boasts that fifty millionaires have come from the vicinity. Young Sid's father was the owner of a large peach orchard, and a natural tradin' man. When the boy was 12, so the story goes, his father offered to trade with him—did, and won. "That'll teach you!" his father exclaimed.

Encouraged and coached by his father, the boy went on trading; when he was 17 the father could boast that his son had made $3500 that year from shrewd cattle trading. With this background, it is little wonder that Richardson stuck out only a year and a half at Baylor University, telling his friends as he left that he saw no reason to spend his energy in the library when there was so much money to be made on the outside.

For four years he learned the ropes as an oil-well supply-company salesman, scout and leaseman. In 1919 he went into business on his own, finding and developing oil fields. By 1933, when he was 42, he had been a millionaire and was broke again. "But I had forty dollars and I was ready to go," he remembers. Once more he began oil prospecting, this time on credit. Two years later he was making $12,000 a month, mostly from oil wells brought in by faith, luck and hard work in West Texas.

Today Richardson holds more oil land than several of America's major oil companies. Financially, he prefers to stick to oil, but on the side he has interests in twenty-three

The Lark on the Wing

Like every other woman, she wanted more than love. Miss Mary wanted romance . . .

By STELLA BLOUNT HYMAN

She sat still at her desk, and slowly, in spite of her unbelief, a tide of pure happiness flooded her whole body. "Why, he means me!" she thought.

The kitchen was full of smoke from the frying fish. Mary Fields raised a window impatiently. I wish they hadn't insisted on having fish tonight, she thought. The scent'll be all in my hair.

She turned the creek perch in the long iron skillet and wrinkled her nose in distaste. Creek fish always smelled like mud. Then, going to the window, she looked out. It had been a windy, cold day, a real March day; but now the wind had fallen, and the sun's pale gold, spread out over the western field, had that elusive look of spring.

Tomorrow'll be a pretty day, she thought, and shivered, half in desperation, half in anticipated happiness. "I can't believe I'm going to do it," she said aloud, cooling her face in the sharp air that came in through the open window. But I am, she went on to herself. What have I got to be afraid of? I'm not a child. I'm forty-five years old, and papa and mamma can't forbid me. After it's over, all they can say won't make any difference.

She turned around and pushed the skillet to the back of the stove, opened the oven door, and looked at the little corn pones browning in the big pan. The kitchen table was already set for supper. Mary looked at the familiar red-checked tablecloth and the old blue dishes they used for every day, and her heart ached. She was terrified to find that she was homesick already.

I mustn't think about home and papa and mamma; I must think about Jim, she determined, standing in front of the stove and pressing her trembling hands together.

Now supper was ready. She dipped up the turnip greens and cut them up fine as her father liked them to be. She put the fish and the corn bread on the table, lifted the heavy agate coffeepot and poured the coffee, strong as lye. Then she opened the door and went through the cold, orderly dining room to the hall beyond. Her father and mother were in the living room on the other side of the house. They heard her coming and, like two eager old children, met her as she opened the door.

"Seems like supper's mighty late," said her father querulously. "Gettin' later every night."

"I had to fry fish. That takes time," said Mary, going CONTINUED ON PAGE 123

Mother Protecting Her Child

BY JEAN-BAPTISTE-CAMILLE COROT
(1796–1875)

It seems to be a general rule that each new generation despises the art of its grandparents. It takes about a hundred years for the silt and mud stirred up by the controversies which always have raged in the art world to settle, so that we can see clearly just what the art of the past had to offer. The Frenchman Corot who painted this picture lived just a hundred years ago, and therefore he has been under the ban of the taste cycle. From being the greatest painter of his generation, he until recently has been condemned as a romantic, and "romanticism" for the last decade has been an insulting term when applied to an artist. This blanket condemnation of an

The busiest clothes in the world

What makes them so busy, so loved, that they can scarcely be spared to go to the cleaners? They have the definite look of fashion but are never extreme. They are not confined to morning, noon or night or to a single season. They are made of silk shantung, wool jersey, flannel, tweed, polka-dot or printed silks or synthetics — pure-gold fabrics that need no proving. They are simple, unself-conscious clothes equally suitable to the world of offices or the lives of busy wives and mothers. They are basic, but tune in easily to a personality, and are often in a personality color. They are the specialty of American designers, available up and down and across the U.S.A.

Nineteen-year-old college sophomore Darlene Dennerlein and her schoolteaching father, Gerry, have a project in common—they both want, and need, to lose 50 pounds. Gerry is 6′1″ tall, weighs close to 300 pounds. "I just love quantities of good food," he admits good-naturedly, "and I top that off by being a nervous nibbler. When things go wrong, I eat." Darlene is 5′10″ tall. Her weight is a "big" secret which she will share only with her mother. On the frozen diet, Darlene and her daddy can satisfy their liking for tempting foods, and at the same time safely lose those 100 extra pounds in approximately five months. "We've already started," says Gerry. "I'm the cook." Darlene adds, "I'm the calorie counter, the menu planner, the cleaner-upper." With this friendly father-daughter competition, there's no reason why both cannot wind up winner!

come to 785. Add the 300 (or slightly under) calories you have consumed at breakfast (appetizing diet breakfasts appear on page 227), and your total daily calorie count comes to 1085.

That's the way our menus measure up in taste appeal and calorie counts throughout your entire diet. Because most weight-worriers are also dessert fanciers, the JOURNAL's new diet can be topped off with delectable frozen assets in the form of fruit-flavored sherbets, cookies or cake. Enjoy Eating Your Extra Pounds Away

You may repeat the diet each week exactly as it appears here. If, for variety, you prefer to switch meals about (for instance, making this Thursday's dinner next Tuesday's luncheon), be sure to plan your rearranging in advance so that the daily calorie count comes close to a grand total of 1000 to 1100. You won't want to have the two main dishes with the highest calorie count or the two main dishes with the lowest calorie count for luncheon and dinner on the same day. By labeling each main-dish container with its calories as well as its contents, it will be simple to pair together the right dishes for each day.

You'll be Eating—and on Your Way to Looking—Like a Queen!

If two of you are dieting. All recipes are designed to provide four individual servings, which will enable two dieting members of your family to have their main dishes for luncheon and dinner stored in the freezer for two full weeks in advance. (We have figured that the diet takes approximately two days' working time to prepare. Count on approximately six hours the first day, four or five hours the second day.)

If three or more of you are dieting. Amounts in each recipe should be increased accordingly. (Your working time will be slightly increased.)

If only one of you is dieting. If it's your husband or your daughter or you who needs to reduce, you have a choice of three methods of preparation. 1—Make all seventeen recipes, cutting quantities in half for a two-week diet. 2—Make all seventeen recipes in full quantities, and have one person's diet set for four full weeks. 3—Cut working time in half by making up only seven main-dish recipes, each in full amount. This will last a single dieter two weeks. Main dishes will be repeated twice in each week, but lots of variety can be attained by varying the accompanying foods which complete each menu. At the end of the two weeks, make up the remaining seven main-dish recipes for another two weeks of dieting. 4—Make up all the recipes in full amounts. The single dieter uses half of these, while the other half can be used to supplement a nondieter's regular meals. (For instance, the salads, soups and mushroom casserole can serve as tempting side dishes for your husband or your youngsters. Heartier fare—beef ragout, kidney stew, shrimp creole—can be a nondieter's main dish, supplemented with generous portions of vegetables, or a buttered baked potato, a filling salad or more elaborate dessert.

ROOMY, RI

GARDEN DESIGNED BY THE AUTHOR

For nearly eight months of the year the garden in good weather gets as delightfully used as the house. Retaining walls and steps of old railroad ties eliminate hard-to-manage slopes and make possible raised beds for easy garden care. Garden floors and paths of used brick, cement squares and gravel provide all-weather underfooting in a nice variety of colors and patterns, and virtually call a halt to weeds. The corkscrew willows are wonderful to watch, and like the white pines and the screen of rosenthal arborvitae are as trouble-free as trees can be.

You come in from the street at lower left on the plan and either park or enter the carport. Guests go round to the entrance terrace, a little paved and planted platform like an open-air lobby. Family come in from the carport or around to the kitchen-garden door. The house is beautifully divided from left to right into rooms for activity, leisure and repose, in that order. And notice as you discover its other advantages that it's a house that gets along without any outside help.

The smooth unbroken expanse of gently sloping roof and the sheer clean-cut walls of vertical cypress siding express a structure that goes all out to be truly economical both in the building and in the maintenance. The sheltered entrance terrace is an unusually attractive note of welcome as you come around the corner of the carport from the drive. And now that the picture has been taken, the row of dogwoods that would have hidden much of the house for you will be planted to make a screen for the bedroom section at the right. Thus adding seclusion to all the other qualities of this relaxful house.

LAXED, RESOURCEFUL

Never too large for two, never too small for four, it fits the changing pattern of a family's life from the start into retirement. By RICHARD PRATT

Architectural and Garden Editor of the Journal

This is a big small-family house. It has a lot to offer. A keen young couple can build it in a semi-rural suburban community for about $20,000, including the cost of an average lot with basic improvements. It's also a house a retired couple can afford to live in with a minimum of household cares, and low upkeep costs. It's a most accommodating house for a family of two or four at any stage of the game.

For a couple starting off, there's a nice economy feature in the fact that the whole inside finishing of the parents' bedroom, dressing room, bath can be delayed indefinitely without any inconvenience whatever; making $1000 you needn't spend at once. The whole hobby-room interior can likewise be let go until the money is more readily available.

The house makes a specialty of usable, enjoyable space particularly in those places where the family does most of its active living—living room, kitchen, family-hobby room, garden. You can't find a square foot that's going to waste. The bedroom arrangement features completeness with compactness. It is partial to the parents, which is fitting and proper. For there will be years when the smaller bedrooms, after the children go, will come in handy for visiting family and friends. And the parents can spread out when they find themselves alone in retirement.

As for storage (that perennial problem), there are, in addition to all the regular closets, a big walk-in closet in the bedroom section, a long storage wall in the carport and a twenty-foot-square storage basement, warm and dry, downstairs from the carport and laundry.

The money, time and trouble that maintenance takes can be a disturbing factor to a young couple starting out; even more so to an older couple contemplating retirement. So the house goes in for features like a gutterless built-up roof with a long-term tenure. Walls of cypress vertical siding can be permanently attention-free. With no high exposed foundation walls to hide, there is no foundation planting to prune, repair and replace. Instead there is a neat, convenient walk-around path of gravel that also drains off the drip from the roof. And the garden, designed to be a true outdoor extension of the house, follows suit. Carefree paving and planting leave all the time you'll ever want for leisure.

Perfect for spring is this flower-spattered room, also full of practical ideas.

Bedroom for Teen-agers

Careful planning makes small bedroom prettier, more convenient, more livable.

By CYNTHIA McADOO WHEATLAND

Interior Decoration Editor of the Journal

Carol and Kathy Dennerlein share a smallish (roughly 12½′x11′) bedroom in the Dennerleins' Long Beach house. Both girls use the room for studying, reading, watching television. They have long planned a rearrangement to make use of every inch of much needed space.

This cheerful "redo" was inspired by a flowery print available in wallpaper, ready-made dust ruffles, puffs, and even sheets and towels—all popularly priced. The rest of the decoration stemmed from this springy pattern. A turquoise cotton-and-fiber rug is inexpensive and ideally suited to beach life, sand being easily swept off the surface. Also, it's reversible! Coverlets are made of bright yellow denim, hardy and washable. The practical, spacesaving desk top is simply a long plank resting on three small chests (inexpensive unpainted furniture). This serves triple duty as vanity, desk and TV stand. The drawers hold the girls' writing materials, cosmetics, and so on, encourage them to neatness.

More storage is found in the large ready-to-install wall closet with sliding doors. Painted white, it ties in with the fresh look of this color scheme. Louvered door and shutters for window were chosen for simplicity and the airy feeling they enhance. Shutters are always an excellent window treatment when the view is unattractive, as is the case here. In this room, they complement the over-all effect of gaiety and charm.

Marriage counseling on a professional level dates back little farther than 1930, when the American Institute of Family Relations was founded. But there has always been such counseling, and most of it has been, and still is, done by clergymen. Yet clergymen—and even more, their wives—sometimes have need of such help in their own lives. This does not prevent them, as a class, from making a conspicuously good record in family life. Not only do they have, along with farmers, the lowest divorce rate in the country, but their children turn out notably well. If ranked by the number included in Who's Who, the offspring of clergymen are surpassed only by the offspring of foreign missionaries. Evidently the self-discipline, self-denial and altruism of the parsonage contribute the qualities of character and stability conducive to successful marriages. Nowhere, today, is there a more active interest in improving the techniques of counseling than among clergymen—no matter if some of them do have to call for help in their own homes from time to time. The counselor in this case was Clinton E. Phillips.

PAUL POPENOE, SC.D., General Director

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

SHE: "As the minister's wife I am regarded as a sort of bloodless symbol, with no normal desires, no preferences, no individuality. To Dana the church's most trivial business takes precedence over any duty he owes his family. I can't stand it any longer."

HE: "Lucy takes no pride in the tremendous growth of our church; she merely complains that I'm away too much, don't earn enough, and that our living accommodations are poor."

LUCY TELLS HER SIDE:

"I married a church, not a man," said Lucy, fifteen years wed, mother of two small sons. Attractive and slender, with beautiful red hair, Lucy's dispirited manner and fretful voice made her seem older than thirty-three. "You can't conceive what it's like to be a clergyman's wife. To Dana the church's most trivial business takes precedence over any duty he owes his family.

"On the Saturday our oldest boy starred in a Little League baseball game, Dana wasn't at the schoolground. Other busy fathers were there. It was no consolation to Johnnie that his father couldn't attend because of a previous commitment to help organize Cub Scout dens. Johnnie is an outgoing youngster, a born joiner—Chuck is our shy, sensitive child—but Johnnie has no interest in becoming a Cub Scout. I don't blame him.

"I can never induce Dana to make a definite promise—something might come up at the church—but two weeks ago he told me he thought he could take the boys and me to an ice-skating exhibition in the next town. He repeatedly postponed the trip. The activities that kept him so frantically occupied were typical. Three weddings, two funerals, his daily round of visiting at the local hospitals, meetings with the finance board, hours getting out the weekly bulletin. Then there were conferences with the Red Cross, with the Community Chest, a young people's dance to supervise, a talk before the Lions Club, a speech at the Chamber of Commerce banquet.

"Yesterday was the last day of the ice show and Dana came home unusually early, around six P.M. I'm optimistic by disposition—or used to be. I hurried supper and called the boys. As we sat down I thanked their father for managing to give over an evening to us. I knew instantly by Dana's expression that the whole matter had slipped his mind. With our boys sitting there all eyes, I begged him not to disappoint us again. I should have known better. Dana's evening was filled until eleven P.M. He was scheduled to hold meetings with three committees—our church is in the midst of its annual fund-raising drive—and the architect was waiting in his study to discuss a Sunday-school addition. With two weeks' notice Dana couldn't find time to drive his own sons fifteen miles, although he averages fifteen hundred miles a month making church calls. We have only the one car, which he considers his exclusive property. I offered to take the youngsters to the ice show and drop him at the church on the way. This was vetoed. Dana had arranged to pick up one of the committee chairwomen. Her car was in the repair shop, her husband and daughter were using their cars.

"When I protested that a woman from a three-car family could afford to hire a taxi, Dana informed me he couldn't afford gasoline for fifteen miles of 'needless' driving and tickets to 'needless' entertainment. I broke down and began to cry. It wasn't that I minded missing the ice show. It was something deeper. What I couldn't bear was the feeling I'd missed everything a woman values in life: gaiety and romance and glamour as a bride; being cherished as a young wife; I'd missed novelty and excitement—I have yet to set foot in a night club or enter a regular theater—and in my thirties it was increasingly clear I was missing out on companionship and content.

"With Dana the church always comes first. When my father suffered a fatal stroke I went back to Ohio on the bus by myself. Dana sits up with the dying and comforts the bereaved; my mother and I dried our own tears. Our first son was born in my home town and my parents saw me through the difficult birth. Dana was attending his Eastern seminary and did not join us until I was out of danger and Johnnie was two weeks old. Throughout our marriage whenever I've felt weak and depressed and in need of masculine strength somebody else has had first call. As I cried out my heart last night it seemed to me that if I lived to be as old as Methuselah I would never have a warm, satisfying marriage. It seemed to me my sons were half orphans and that they deserved a concerned, affectionate father like other children.

"After Dana left the house, I pulled myself together, cleared the table, settled the boys in their room and read them a story. By then I was started on a migraine attack. A bad one. This morning it was all I could do to crawl out of bed. According to our physician, my migraine headaches are psychological in origin. Dana thinks I should conquer my attacks by the sheer power of will. I have tried, but my headaches have grown steadily and frighteningly worse.

"I blame Dana's church for my ill health and chronic wretchedness. I'm a comparatively young woman. I don't want to drag on until I'm middle-aged, miserably unhappy all the time.

"Dana is capable of earning a livelihood outside the ministry. As soon as he finishes writing his thesis, he will get his Ph.D. and be qualified to teach on a college level. The wives and families of college instructors have private lives, private interests, a little freedom.

"Dana's congregation refuses to think of me as a human being. As the minister's wife I am regarded as a sort of bloodless symbol, with no normal desires, no preferences, no tastes, no individuality. I can't stand it any longer. For that matter, I burn at the way Dana himself is treated. Not one of his congregations has ever appreciated his sacrifices. His present church is still

PARTY CHICKEN... CHINESE STYLE

DI PIETRO

In our party casserole, tender chicken strips mingle with water chestnuts, green beans and crisp, golden walnuts, deliciously seasoned with soy sauce.

Our party meal is designed to be served buffet style; no knives invited! With a set of small tables to place within handy reach of your guests, buffet service couldn't be easier.

Haven't you always wanted to give a party with delicious food that can be effortlessly served? Well, this is for you. Our casserole main dish has tender thin slivers of chicken, crisp sliced water chestnuts, savory green beans and crunchy walnuts. Complementing the heavenly chicken is a serving of hot, buttery rice. All accompanied by the sharp, sweet tang of cold pineapple chunks drenched with an exotically seasoned French dressing in a nest of crisp, fresh salad greens.

Set the scene for your party early in the day, with little tables conveniently arranged around the living room, or trays big enough to hold a glass, fork, napkin and plate. Serving from the buffet is no problem, as there is nothing to carve or maneuver. Just arrange your colorful casserole, rice and salad, and the light-as-a-feather croissant rolls sprinkled with aromatic fennel. These, of course, you can get ready the day before. Pop into the oven fifteen minutes before it's time to eat. A tempting tray of cheeses and a bowl of little Chinese fortune cookies complete the meal.

For later in the evening your guests may like to nibble on creamy bonbons in a springtime rainbow of colors that look pretty placed casually around the room on occasional tables.

For the main event, the party chicken Chinese style, prepare in two stages. It's so simple. You cut and dice and sliver the ingredients for the main dish early in the day; cooking this dish shortly before it is to be served takes just a few minutes. As you will see.

CHINESE CHICKEN AND WALNUTS

Have your butcher give you six large chicken breasts—skinned and boned, if he will. (The Chinese word for "please" is "ching," you might like to know.) Slice the chicken into thin julienne strips; sauté the strips in a large skillet, in a quarter cup of butter, for just a few minutes, till the meat turns white. Now add a cup of thinly sliced water chestnuts, a cup of diced bamboo shoots, two cups of sliced celery, and half a pound of green beans, fresh or frozen, cut into thin, small slivers. You'll have about two cups. Pour over the mixture in the skillet three cups of chicken CONTINUED ON PAGE 232

The mood is gay and relaxed, the food is delectable: use your prettiest, most colorful casserole and dishes, napkins and flowers in rainbow colors.

Twenty-Minute Triumphs FROM THE JOURNAL KITCHEN

Save the minutes and the hours will take care of themselves.

Believing as we do that the power of women is not to be underestimated, it is hardly surprising that we have on our staff a number of young wives and mothers whose activities are protean. Much as they might prefer to spend pleasant hours in the kitchen (for the kitchen has well been called the heart of the home), it often turns out, between one thing and a dozen, that supper is something that must be made in a trice. The definition of "trice" is highly variable, but for the purpose of this page it is set at twenty minutes. Here is a clutch of trice-time recipes perfected by the busiest young editors we know—and for those readers who may find it hard at first glance to believe that anything really good can be cooked in such a short space of time, we recommend Mr. Thurber's maxim that "seeing is deceiving—it's eating that's believing."

Triumph of the Egg: An omelet is often the answer for the housewife-in-a-hurry, but an ordinary omelet will hardly do. Call it a Piperade, however, and you have a chance of arousing any husband's interest, even before he has tasted it. Thinly slice one green pepper and sauté it slowly in three tablespoons salad oil, along with one onion, finely chopped. After they go limp on you, add one peeled and seeded tomato, one clove garlic, crushed, and salt and black pepper to taste. (Freshly ground Telicherry pepper will work wonders.) Simmer the mixture until it reaches the purée stage. Add a half dozen eggs and stir only enough to mix well with the vegetables. Then cook slowly until eggs are set. Serve the Piperade on slices of toast, or thin slices of ham, previously sautéed and kept comfortably warm in the oven.

Avocado halves stuffed with crab and hollandaise—then whisked to the oven for two or three minutes.

Pleasures of Pasta: Pasta in one of its myriad forms is another sterling stand-by, but again it should be pasta with a difference. Try tagliarini—the green noodle with the built-in spinach—cooked al dente and tossed in butter and enough liver pâté to form a substantial sauce, about three tablespoons of butter and four of pâté to a package of noodles.

Quick-as-a-Wink Crab Meat: Cut four small avocados in half lengthwise, pit them, and brush the surface with lime or lemon juice. Then bone two cans crab meat and mix with a jar of hollandaise sauce. Stir in a pinch of curry, heat the mixture to serving temperature, and spoon it into the waiting avocado halves. Top the crab meat with buttered bread crumbs, and put the stuffed avocados under the broiler for two or three minutes, not too close to the heat—just long enough to warm the cockles of their hearts. Hot biscuits go well with this elegancy, so why not brown up a batch of pan-ready packaged biscuits; and if you've never tried whipped, lighter-than-air butter before, this is your chance.

Sole Superb: Fish is at its best when treated like the delicate creature it is, and this means a minimum of cooking. Fillets of sole especially are amenable to the trice treatment. Take four good-sized fillets and simmer them gently in a sauce made of one can frozen oyster stew and one small (four-ounce) can drained sliced mushrooms, and salt and pepper to taste. Just before serving, bedew them with a few drops of lemon juice. Rice is the right-thinking housewife's accompaniment to this dish; and perhaps a salad of jade-green, tender-hearted lettuce.

Beefeaters' Bonanza: Hamburger hath charms, and don't forget that it's really minced beef into the bargain, whatever its name may imply. For beef-and-potato lovers, try heating one tablespoon butter, stirring in one tablespoon flour, adding one can (one-pound) tomatoes gradually, onion salt to taste, bay leaf, and a dash of hot pepper sauce. Stir the sauce until thickened. The scene is now laid for the entrance of a pound of hamburger, which is simmered, covered, until cooked to your taste. Serve it all on beds of mashed potatoes made from the new instant mix.

Veal in Velvet: Buy eight veal cutlets pounded very thin—the kind you use for scaloppine. Melt two tablespoons shortening, and stir in one heaping teaspoon paprika. Add one medium onion, finely chopped, and sauté it slowly until soft but not brown. Dip the cutlets in seasoned flour and add them to the mixture in the pan. Brown them on both sides over medium heat, cover and simmer gently for ten minutes. Stir in one and one half cups sour cream. Simmer until heated through. Serve with noodles.

Happy Cheese Dream: Bread and cheese have been a source of cheer since antiquity, but it took a fine Italian hand to evolve spiedini alla Romana, literally Roman skewers, a delectable dish that is put together on the principle of the kebab. Thread alternate small square slices of buttered bread and Mozzarella cheese on skewers, crisscross anchovies over the top, and rest the ends of each skewer on opposite edges of an ovenproof dish. Place the skewer-laden dish under the broiler till the Mozzarella is molten, the bread golden brown and the anchovies deliquesce into the delicious whole. Broiled tomatoes may be accomplished at one and the same time, dusted with orégano to complete the Mediterranean mood.

And while we're about it, let us suggest a new approach to the leftover. It was inspired by advice given us once when we were in the habit of mislaying things. "Just pretend that you're a pocketbook (or a box of stamps, or a volume of Emily Dickinson). Very well. Now, if you were a pocketbook, where would you like to be?" Works like a charm. Try considering the leftover in the same light. If you were the tail end of a boiled tongue, or an extra hard-cooked egg, or that eternal bit of ham, where would you like to be? There follow two happy hunting grounds for odds and ends of this sort, recipes where, we're sure, all such odds and ends—the hidden gold of the refrigerator—would be happy to end up.

Pancakes par Excellence: Make up a batch of French pancakes, the thin flat kind that won't fall because they don't rise (what does not go up will not come down). Keep them warm, and make a stuffing of a half dozen chopped mushrooms, three quarters cup chopped ham, chicken, veal or tongue, two chopped hard-cooked eggs, a little parsley and enough heavy cream to bind them all together. Season the filling to taste and heat it to serving temperature. Quickly roll up the pancakes with the hot filling and secure them with toothpicks—actually, they will stay curled up quite quietly without, if you like. And away we go!

Fried Rice, Everything Nice: Here is one to do chop-chop, and an ideal way to dispatch the last of the noble pork roast. Prepare a cup of rice and keep it warm over steam. Meanwhile, sauté three tablespoons chopped onion, one cup bean sprouts, and one and one half cups diced leftover pork, shrimp or lobster in one tablespoon butter until the onions are soft. Now add the steamed rice, and toss in one tablespoon soy sauce and two more tablespoons butter. Mix everything together well so that the soy sauce tans the rice, and stir it over low heat until heated through.

A LAST WORD TO THE WISE: An excellent aid to trice-timing is to ask one of the children to set the table. For children are very much a part of this picture. Though this miscellany includes one or two dishes which are a far cry from the "bread and milk and blackberries for supper" of Peter Rabbit fame, we have noticed that the young are often enthralled by "grownup" foods.

PRIZE-WINNING GRAND NATIONAL RECIPE

Grand Prize Winner:

8th Grand National Bake-Off

MRS. HILDRETH H. HATHEWAY
Santa Barbara, California

"I have used Campbell's Soups in recipes for years. I wouldn't think of making sauces the old, slow way—when Campbell's Soups are so much easier and more flavorful. They're seasoned exactly right, and they blend so perfectly with so many foods."

California Casserole: Coat 2 lbs. veal round steak with ⅓ cup Pillsbury's Best Enriched Flour and 1 tsp. paprika. Pound mixture into meat; cut into 2-in. cubes. Brown meat well in ¼ cup salad oil or other shortening. Transfer to 14 x 10 x 2-in. pan; add 1¾ cups drained, small cooked onions. Combine 1 can Campbell's Cream of Chicken Soup and 1 soup can of water in skillet used for browning. Bring to boil; pour over meat. Bake uncovered at 350°F. 45 min. or until tender. Top with 14 to 16 dumplings. Bake uncovered at 425°F. 20 to 25 min. or till deep golden brown.

Butter Crumb Dumplings: Sift together 2 cups sifted Pillsbury's Best Enriched Flour, 4 tsps. double-acting baking powder, ½ tsp. salt and 1 tsp. poultry seasoning into mixing bowl. Add 1 tsp. each celery seed, dry onion flakes and 1 tbsp. poppy seed. Add ¼ cup salad oil and 1 cup milk. Stir until moistened. Drop rounded tbsp. of dough into mixture of ¼ cup melted butter and 1 cup bread crumbs. Roll to coat with crumbs.
Sauce: Heat 1 can Campbell's Cream of Chicken Soup and 1 cup sour cream just to boiling. Pour over meat and dumplings to serve. Serves 8.

AND THESE EASY CASSEROLES WILL WIN PRAISE IN YOUR HOME, TOO!

SOUPER BAKED CHICKEN

Thaw 2 packages Swanson Frozen Chicken Parts; put in shallow baking dish. Blend 1 can Cream of Chicken Soup with 1 minced clove garlic; pour over chicken. Sprinkle 1 tablespoon chopped parsley and dash of paprika on top. Bake in a moderate oven (350°F.) about 1 hour or until chicken is tender. 6-8 servings. Good!

PERFECT TUNA CASSEROLE

A never-fail meal all in one dish! In 1 qt. casserole, combine 1 can Campbell's Cream of Mushroom Soup, ½ cup milk, 7-oz. can drained, flaked tuna, 1 cup drained, cooked peas, 1 cup crushed potato chips. Garnish with additional potato chips. Bake in moderate oven (375°F.) about 25 minutes. 4 servings.

EGGS FLORENTINE

An easy specialty. Line bottom of shallow baking pan with 2 cups chopped, cooked spinach. Break 6 eggs and place each on spinach. Heat together 1 can Cream of Celery Soup and 1 cup shredded process cheese; pour around eggs. Sprinkle with ½ cup shredded cheese. Bake in moderate oven (350°F.) about 30 minutes. 6 servings.

Charting a safer course against CANCER . . .

Just as the pilots of ships are helped to chart safer courses by heeding signals, so, too, have many people been made safe by recognizing warning signals of possible cancer and taking proper action. In fact, thousands of people are alive and well today because they knew cancer's warning signs and were treated in time.

According to the American Cancer Society, it is estimated that there are about 800,000 persons living in America who were saved from cancer. So, for your own protection, you should know the seven danger signals which may mean cancer. They are listed here for you.

Remember, however, that these signals do not always indicate cancer. Rather, they may just be signs that something is wrong—and that you should see your doctor promptly. If cancer is found, precious time will be gained by starting treatment immediately.

Even if no symptoms occur, it is important to have periodic health examinations, particularly if you are 35 years of age or older. Studies show that about 95 percent of all cancers are found in people over 35.

Through health examinations, many cancers are discovered before symptoms develop. If the disease is detected early, chances for cure or control are generally greatly increased. For example, at least 95 percent of the cases of skin cancer could be saved if diagnosed early and properly treated.

If people would act promptly when a danger signal is noticed . . . if apparently well people would have their doctors examine them regularly . . . the American Cancer Society believes that the annual number of cancer cases saved from death could be increased 50% with weapons now at hand.

Cancer's Seven Warning Signals

1. Any sore that does not heal.
2. A lump or thickening in the breast or elsewhere.
3. Unusual bleeding or discharge.
4. Any change in a wart or mole.
5. Persistent indigestion or difficulty in swallowing.
6. Persistent hoarseness or cough.
7. Any change in normal bowel habits.

These facts point up the vital importance of early detection and treatment. Surgery, X-rays and other forms of radiation offer the best assurance of cure. Remember, however, that there is no "sure-cure" for cancer . . . despite some claims that are made.

Medical science is now pushing a total attack against cancer . . . and progress is being made in both cancer diagnosis and treatment. Meantime, you have a responsibility to yourself and others to:

1. Have periodic health examinations
2. Know cancer's early danger signals
3. Get prompt medical care at once if any danger signal appears.

table Peale stopped to speak to several members, introducing Lowry to them.

It was in such contrast to his usual aloofness that Lowry said, "You've got awful pally."

"I think you'll find it does no harm to let people feel you're interested in them."

Peale ordered and then took a handful of peanuts.

"Tell me," he said casually: "you see a good deal of Evans and Hewitt—have they indicated at all who they think will move in back of Tom when Edward steps down?"

"Never been mentioned," Lowry said. "Why?"

"Well, you've been there long enough to see the whole picture. Do you think I'm fooling myself in thinking it is likely to be me? Hewitt's slightly my senior, but they'll never take him. Leslie Evans—well, you know. As a matter of fact, Steve, I sometimes get the feeling it might lie between us."

"Oh, nonsense."

"No. I mean it and I base it on what I've heard Tom Johnson say about you. Certainly if it does go that way, no one will welcome it more than I and that's the main reason I may seem to tell you things you ought to watch as much as I do."

"Jim, my boy," Lowry said. "I think there is something you ought to watch, and that's not pressing so. You press at the office and you pressed just now in the court. If I weren't out of practice you'd have been hopelessly trimmed."

"If it is me, I should think you'd follow," Peale went on. "It would be a wonderful thing if after all these years we ended one, two at ——"

"But that's ridiculous. Your number two will be somebody ten years younger than I am."

"Just a minute, I want to speak to Henry Dennison. You know him, don't you?"

"Yes," Lowry said. "Go ahead."

Peale got up and as quickly sat down again. "I didn't see Alec Channing with him. I can't stand that fellow."

Channing passed with a curt nod to Peale and patted Lowry on the head. "Tell Rosalie I want to take you both out for a nice fish dinner," he said without pausing.

"What's that about?" Peale asked.

"An old joke."

"I didn't suppose Channing joked," Peale said. "Getting back to what I was saying about your watching things—I don't mean that this is one—but Evvy told me you told some woman you were going to retire and write a book. You weren't serious, of course?"

"No, but don't look as though I told her I was going to rob the company," Lowry replied. "Did you ever meet Garrett Maynard?"

"Who? I don't believe so."

"Garrett Maynard. He was a partner in Rantoul and Company before the war and he died of wounds in Naples. I met him in the hospital and he knew he wouldn't live. He told me his greatest regret was that he wouldn't be able to write the book he had planned and he urged me to get someone to do it. Finally he asked me to—and the last letter he wrote was to have his trustee turn over the material to me. It's far beyond my abilities but it is the thing which at some point I'd like to try."

"What's it about?"

"The Principal Errors of Judgment of Rulers and Peoples since the Reformation."

"How'd you happen to tell Paula Hewitt about it? And Evelyn heard about it too."

"Paula used to know Maynard and happened to ask me if I'd ever met him. She'd even heard about the book."

Peale shook his head. "It's just that it gets back to what I said to you the first day, Stephen—you can't make business a half-time thing."

"No, Mr. Peale," Lowry said with a grin.

"It's not a joke," Peale replied.

When Lowry telephoned Rosalie that he would be a little late getting home, because of squash with Peale, he sounded so pleasant about it that she felt glad for him. It had been apparent in their frequent meetings with the Peales that he was disappointed at the gulf which time and distance had made between them. At first she had feared that perhaps she was in the way. But with her alone Peale talked much more freely than with Lowry. With him, there was something slightly superior, something critical if not censorious of Stephen's general outlook, which annoyed her. And there was another aspect which troubled her and of which she had not spoken to Stephen, but which she felt she must.

He came in, glowing with health and exercise, and told her with usual good cheer of how badly he had lost at squash, and of how Peale's volleying was as terrific as it had been twenty years ago.

"We had a really swell time," he said, "until Jim began on his corporation prospects and my business shortcomings. Incidentally, what does he talk to you about? I notice he does a great deal."

"Yes, he does, more than Evelyn likes, I think, and more than I do sometimes. To start with he was very amusing, but recently he talks almost wildly about the company and do you think he'll succeed Mr. Johnson. He has great appeal at times, like a brilliant, troubled adolescent."

"He's always been brilliant."

"Stephen, there is something else. He apparently craves to talk about sex. It isn't so much talking about it as half asking, or leading up to, the most intimate sort of details or questions ——"

"Do you answer?"

"Of course not."

"You're not about to tell me he's in love with you, are you? Of course I should think any man would be, but leave that aside."

"Well, no, but I must say I think he could easily be, and he has restless hands. I'll be glad when summer comes and we don't have to see so much of them."

"I'll be damned," Lowry said. "And I thought I was one of the least jealous of men. I take it you don't meet him for little lunches and so on."

"I don't, but he has telephoned to ask me and the other day he sent a note by messenger."

"What did it say?"

"Darling, you will be glad to know I couldn't read his writing and I just sent it back."

He laughed. "What a relief. A woman can always read the writing of any man she's in love with even if it's in Chinese. I should say he needed 'psychiatric help,' as they call it."

"I hope this isn't going to bother you at the office."

"Not as far as you're concerned, no. As far as he is, yes. Tell me this: they spend an awful lot of money; is he worried about that?"

"I don't know. He likes to talk about how much they spend. There's one thing more and then let's talk about something else. Do you remember how annoyed I was at the hotel that you left the picture of me sunning for the Rutledges to see?"

"Yes, I was sorry, but I didn't know they were coming."

"And you remember the to-do Jim made about it later. Well, I can't find the picture since they were here the other night. I'm sure he took it with him."

"It was on my bureau and he was in there alone." Then he added, "He did take it."

"How do you know?"

"Because the summer we were out of college we went to a big coming-out party and the hostess had on some marvelous perfume. The tennis court had been covered for dancing. Everyone, of course, was out there. Jim said he must have the perfume and he went back to the empty house, found the hostess' bedroom and put the bottle in his pocket. At the time it seemed amusing. Later I didn't think so well of it because some maid was accused. I remember the bulge in the pocket of his white dinner jacket and I swear it came back to me the other night when he came out of the room. I must have noticed the bulge of the picture."

There was nothing about Peale's behavior or demeanor the rest of the week to suggest he was in need of any kind of help. His only reference to the previous day was in good-natured superiority about his squash. Lowry noticed that on Thursday and Friday he was in long conference alone with Rutledge. Altogether it seemed ridiculous to suppose he could have taken the picture from the Lowrys' bedroom.

As Peale was leaving Friday he said to Lowry that he was off Monday night for three weeks in Ohio ending, he hoped, with a week's holiday at White Sulphur with Evelyn.

"You'll hear the details at the officers' meeting Monday. I'll be in and around Larus most of the time and I'd like very much to see your mother. She's near there, isn't she?"

"Right there, really. She'd love it."

"Well, send her a word of warning, will you, and say I'll ring her up?"

The brief exchange was so easy and natural that Lowry felt more and more uncertain about the neurotic pilfering. And the fact that Peale was going to White Sulphur probably indicated that he realized he had been overworking. His occasional apathy might be sheer fatigue.

At the officers' meeting Monday morning Rutledge was in the chair, Johnson on his right and Peale for the first time on his left. Leslie Evans, sitting next to Lowry, whispered, "I wonder if we're seeing history made. I'd never have believed it."

"That doesn't mean anything," Hewitt said. "Stephen, don't run off after the meeting. There's something I want to ask you."

Rutledge disposed briefly of several items and then started some single sheets of figures clockwise around the table. After watching their progress halfway, he put on his glasses and studied his copy. Rutledge said, "You have here the balance sheet of Larus Earth-Moving and will note not only their strong cash position but their earnings over twenty years. The family still holds three quarters of the stock and has had little to do with the company for some years. They're at last ready to pull out, and the management can either put out some preferred stock or it can come to somebody like us. Thanks to the man on my left, they have chosen the path of wisdom. I'll let him tell you about it. Jim?"

"I first talked to Edward about this six months ago and at that time we wondered ——"

"I wondered, you never did," Rutledge said with a smile.

"Well, it was felt, then," Peale said, smiling, "that diversification could go too far. The book value of their stock, compared with ours, makes a three-for-one trade a simple and attractive one. There's a forecast of the effect on our earnings at the bottom of the page."

"Our directors approve but leave the decision in your hands," Rutledge added.

Evans asked, "What portion of their unfilled orders are Government?"

"Under twenty per cent."

"How much abroad?" Lowry asked.

"About the same, well spread over a dozen countries."

"I know Burnham quite well," Hewitt said, "and like him very much."

"He bid on some equipment when I was in Paris and the French trade-unions raised some question about him and his labor relations," Lowry said. "Hasn't he had a good deal of trouble, or made it for himself?"

"No, no. A year or so ago he shut down to do some conversion and his labor didn't like it. Some people said he was pushing automation too fast. To my mind, it was all on the credit side."

"He has a union contract, I take it," Johnson asked.

"Oh, no, he's always refused to deal with the union."

"Then I don't like it at all," Johnson continued. "In my view we have no better asset than our labor record. If he doesn't want to deal with them, he can take his business elsewhere as far as I'm concerned."

"I didn't understand Lowry to be making an issue of it ——" Peale started to say.

Rutledge came to his assistance. "I thought, Tom, we could decide on this today. I don't like to delay it, so let's decide, but let Jim tell them his associates have raised that question and want to be sure our general policies will be his."

"You mean just say that and have him agree and then sign up?" Peale asked.

"I don't mean that. I think this is a good time to ask our friend Cramer to have a talk with him," Johnson said.

"I rather like the idea of having Cramer in," Rutledge said. "How does it strike you, Jim?"

"Well, I don't see the necessity, but if that's what's wanted, I accept it. I only hope it ——"

"Look," Johnson said, "Burnham's a good manufacturer. If he were a good executive he wouldn't have been under the thumbs of that family so long. He doesn't know how to deal with a union official. He ought to be grateful for what Cramer can tell him."

"Of course we don't want to get him mad, after going this far, and see him high-tail it off to Avaco or somebody, Tom," Rutledge said.

"Has he shown any signs of doing that?" Johnson asked.

"No, but it doesn't mean he won't," Peale replied.

"How did you get on to it originally?" Evans asked Peale.

"From a mutual friend. Like the FBI, we have to protect our informants."

"There's no finder's fee involved, I take it?" Curtis asked.

"No. How's it to be left?" Peale asked. "Cramer tutors him? I get him to promise to be kind and thoughtful with his labor or the French may be mad, then do we go ahead?"

"Personally I want to know first that a union contract has been signed," Johnson said.

"Now what will you settle for, Tom?" Rutledge asked in an attempt to be jocular. "My thought is Jim goes out there and says O.K. and then he says something like this, 'Now I'd just like to review the question of labor relations and make sure we are thinking along the same lines. We want you to talk to D. P. Cramer.' He does so. The union contract comes along in due time. Now why isn't that enough for us all? After all, Burnham won't own Larus. We will. This whole thing's been admirably handled by Jim from the start and I don't want him to feel we're not appreciative. All agreed?"

More or less everyone nodded as Hewitt whispered to Lowry, "I still wonder where Jim got the tip. Oh, this is what I wanted to ask you, what are you doing Friday night?"

"Nothing that I know of."

"Well, do you mind," Hewitt asked, "letting me say at home that we're having dinner together? I'll do the same for you sometime."

At that instant, slightly troubled at having brought up the matter of the Larus labor record and touched off such a change in the negotiations, Lowry did not catch the import of the question.

"I don't know that I can have dinner," he said.

"No, no, it's just that I want to see someone and I'd rather not tell Paula. I'd just like to have her think we're out with some customer. You don't mind, do you?"

"Well, I suppose not," Lowry said coldly, "but I don't like to involve Rosalie—I mean, if they see each other."

"It'll never come up. Just be a pal this once, will you?"

"O.K.," Lowry said. "I'll not tell Rosalie, though."

"Don't want you to. Thanks a lot."

NEW! FOR AUTOMATIC DISHWASHERS

Cascade eliminates drops that spot!

Cascade has an exclusive ingredient to change drops of water into cleansing, clear-rinsing "sheets." That's why Westinghouse puts Cascade in every new machine!

These two glasses show why Cascade stops spotting as no other detergent can. Cascade's exclusive ingredient changes water drops into free-flowing sheets. And Cascade's unique formula leaves everything so slippery-clean, rinse water slides right off. Result: no water drops to dry into ugly spots. Cascade gets even glasses spotless . . . close-up clean. Yet it's safer for gold leaf and other delicate china patterns than any other detergent.

Westinghouse advises you to use
PROCTER & GAMBLE'S
Cascade
(IN FACT, EVERY LEADING DISHWASHER MANUFACTURER RECOMMENDS IT.)

Only Westinghouse has the Water Temperature Monitor that gives you 140-degree hot water every time—wash water hot enough to remove stubborn soil and to assure sanitary-clean dishes. It also provides 140° hot water for free-flow rinsing and spotless drying. Result: you can be sure of sparkling, sanitary-clean dishes, glasses, pots and pans with the Westinghouse dishwasher. And to eliminate drops that spot, Westinghouse packs Cascade in every machine.

YES, THAT'S DIANA LYNN . . . STAR OF TELEVISION AND MOTION PICTURES

They separated and Lowry followed Peale into his office. Peale's manner was one of tried but polite patience.

"You know," he said, "I don't of course know what's customary in present-day Government meetings, but if I may advise you in a meeting here, don't go off half-cocked with ideas. I thought six months' hard, taxing negotiations—incidentally, to our great advantage—were out the window. You must know by this time that Tom Johnson is supersensitive about labor. It all stems from that brother who served a jail term."

"I'm sorry," Lowry said, "but I still don't see ——"

"Well, you saw what it started. You must have guessed how I got onto this."

"No, I don't."

"You don't realize that Dolly's first wife was a Larus granddaughter?"

"Now that you mention it, yes. I never met her, as they were married and divorced while I was in the Army."

"She told Dolly. Dolly told me. Incidentally, I haven't told anyone here it was he."

"I see. In that case I want to be absolutely sure of one thing: that there is no finder's fee going to be paid Dolly in any form."

"I said no at the meeting, didn't I?"

"Jim, I don't want to quibble and I don't want to sound righteous, but Dolly has no moral scruples about anything. Do you give me your word he's getting nothing in any way, shape or form out of this?"

"What are you so hot about? The corporation is not paying a fee to Dolly. I certainly am not. Burnham's not, so do we need all this 'under oath' business? If you'll stop and think, you'll see you've done me and your brother an injustice."

It was all said plausibly and with evident candor. But it left Lowry still uneasy, because he did not feel it was the whole truth.

He said nothing about it to Rosalie that night for several reasons, the principal one being that he did not want to seem to be making a case against Peale every time he spoke of him. He was inclined to give Peale more than the benefit of any doubts. So at least he felt until, alone in the bedroom, his eye became aware of the space where the picture of Rosalie had stood. He felt a cold anger all over him and, going to the door, called to her, "No sign of your picture?"

She got up from the sofa in the living room and came down the small hall. "I've looked everywhere for it. I am so furious about it. I almost called him to demand it. Did you give any sign about it?"

"No. He's going out to Ohio tonight and meeting Evelyn in White Sulphur at the end of the month. I may go through their apartment while they're gone."

"I suppose I let you take the picture because it was fun in all that sun and air, and this is our punishment. I'm most furious because—well, I don't know how to say it, but I feel self-conscious even toward you now. And I don't feel happy. The more successful you are, the more separated we'll become. How far's Grosse Pointe from Detroit?"

"Oh, twenty minutes or so by car. Why?"

"I read in the paper today about this enormously important industrialist who has 'an estate' in Grosse Pointe and a nine-room suite at his office where business keeps him three nights a week. Think of it. If we took a house in Connecticut, you'd be twenty hours a week, almost a day, going back and forth, I don't know what's to become of us. We have to get a place for the children ——"

"Well, dear," he said gently, "everybody's up against this. It's modern life. We can't go live in a chalet in a valley like the song mother sang in the Follies."

"I could, very happily. I'm still a peasant. But I don't feel like cooking your dinner tonight. You'll have to take me out to some horrible restaurant."

They took a cab to the pleasantly expensive restaurant on East 54th Street where the headwaiter recommended early shad roe and new asparagus. Rosalie gave him a look of mock horror and Lowry said gravely their religion prevented their having roe. The captain looked distressed at his blunder and suggested duckling.

Rosalie said she loved people to have private jokes. "I'm sure Jim and Evelyn haven't any now, or the Hewitts either. I can't understand why so many people marry the wrong person."

"The trouble is they stop and think it over too long."

"You mean that the way to a happy marriage is just to see a pretty herring gutter and marry her?"

"I found it satisfactory."

"The trouble with a marriage like the Hewitts' ——"

"You have got them on your mind, haven't you?"

"Yes. I like her very much and I feel very sorry for her. If a husband is dull—no ideas, no knowledge, no fun—that's bad enough, but women put up with it. But with someone like them love or whatever he feels for her has no tenderness."

"Does she tell you all this?"

"She has told me some. She's the sort of person who would give her life for someone she loved—without complaint, rich or poor, sick or well. What does he have in the office to do so well?"

"Well, he's shrewd, affable, breezy."

"I don't think there's any place but business where that would be enough to succeed."

"Darling, you're mistaken," Lowry said. "There are people just like him in politics, on university faculties. He hasn't any doubts about things. I often wish I hadn't."

"What a bore you'd be."

They both studied the desserts on the menu for a moment and Rosalie, looking up at the headwaiter, noticed a woman about her age across the room, leaning forward, hand half raised to signal them. She was slim and dark and the smiling seriousness of her face was unusually attractive even across the room. She was with three people, all in evening dress. Rosalie half smiled in return and the woman pointed with her forefinger at Lowry.

Rosalie said to him, "Look up. A lovely woman wants to wave to you."

Lowry looked up. "Oh, my ——" he said, half rising. As he did the woman slipped out between the tables and came over to them.

"Stephen," she said, "I had to speak to you. What a delightful surprise."

"This is wonderful," he said, glancing at her ringless hand. "Rosalie, this is Lorna Hume."

Rosalie put out her hand and smiled, never having heard of Lorna before but feeling certain she should say, "Oh, of course. Stephen has spoken of you so often." Her own hackles stirred, if they did not rise, but she herself felt the strong appeal in the attractive face and slim figure. She also had the feeling that Lorna had avoided looking directly at her as they shook hands.

"We're about to have coffee. Can't you sit down?" she asked Lorna.

Lorna glanced inquiringly back at her table, motioned that she was staying with them, and a waiter brought a chair, which Lowry took, seating her on the banquette beside Rosalie.

Listening to their rapid-fire news of what each was doing—Lorna was with one of the magazines—she had a disturbing feeling of both their intimacy and their self-consciousness before her. She saw Lorna break a sugar lump into her coffee and Lowry hold the bowl for her to take a second.

Lorna glanced from the children's pictures Stephen had taken from his wallet and handed them back with appropriate comment.

Lowry scribbled their address and telephone number on a slip of paper and she gave them hers. He said he would remember it.

"He has an elephant's memory for everything," Rosalie said sweetly. Though to a degree they made her feel an outsider, she felt a certain wifely pity for Lorna.

"I must go back," she said, looking at her table, "but, Stephen, tell me first where and how is Principal Errors of Judgment?"

"Oh, still some years off," he said.

"Every once in a while I've copied a note for you from something I've read. I'll send them."

Stephen and she got up and she gave Rosalie a hand in good-by and called her Mrs. Lowry.

The others at her table rose and she went out with them without looking back.

Lowry sat down a little glumly. "What are you thinking?" he asked in a moment.

"Well, many things, of course, dear. One is what a lovely name Lorna Lowry would have been."

"Oh, I don't know, sounds like a Stephen Collins Foster title. I am sorry I never happened to mention Lorna. We were friends in the '30's."

"Darling, everything is all right, but do be careful what you tell me. I happen to know Garrett Maynard didn't tell you about Principal Errors in the '30's. I think we better go."

"I wish you wouldn't feel there's some mystery about this."

"Dear, I don't think there's any mystery. She's terrifically attractive and I'm glad you met again. That's all there is to it."

"But I can see you don't feel that way about it."

"You really want to go on about it in this restaurant? Do pay the bill. I'll meet you at the door."

She went to the powder room, sure that all the women in the restaurant could see that she was a jealous wife, making a scene. And she was angry with Stephen because he had managed somehow to make her feel an alien, and angrier at letting herself feel so—after all the years when, though she was an alien, he had made wherever they were home and refuge. I wouldn't mind, she kept saying to rationalize it, if he didn't act so like a guilty boy about it.

He followed her into the unlighted living room, came over to her, his voice flat and unnatural, saying, "Dear, is everything changed or what is the matter?"

"Nothing's changed. I suppose it's just that I don't think—of course I don't know—that I've ever seen you with a former lover before and it's a little disconcerting. I'm very sorry. I don't want to make it hard for you. I don't blame you—but you might have told me about Principal Errors."

"Is it just Principal Errors?"

"I don't know what 'just' means. It's a great deal to find I've deceived myself about that. But please understand I don't blame either of you. She's quite lovely."

"It was before the war," he said.

"And how often after, since you want to talk about it?"

"I saw her in '48 when I was back. She went with me to Maynard's brother's for the notes."

"Now you've found her, can't she help you with the book? Did you see her in '51?"

"Yes."

"Did you correspond in the meantime?" Rosalie asked.

"No," he said impatiently. "I don't care whether——"

"Don't say you don't care whether you ever see her again as though someone who loves you doesn't matter."

"That's the most unreasonable and provoking remark I ever heard," he said. "Can't we finish with this?"

"I can't. I'm very sorry. I'm sorriest because for the first time I can't tell you what I really feel."

"Try."

"No, please go to bed and leave me alone."

She looked over her shoulder in dismay as he stalked out of the room like a martyr. The thing is, she thought, I have never been sexually jealous before and I had no idea what it would be like. And it's a loathsome state. There was a foolish pet name she kept for times when he was troubled or depressed. If she could only go in and say it to him now. But had Lorna had some similar tender folly? And who else? Neither of those possibilities really mattered. It only mattered that she could not go in and absurdly say, "You're my dear manager," and be sure it would comfort and bring him close again.

He was in the shower when she came into the bathroom in the morning and saw with alarm that there had been a major change in him. His shaving brush was unrinsed, his razor undried and the cap was not on the tooth paste. Hastily brushing her teeth, she put her head around the corner of the curtain.

"Good morning, darling," she said, trying to look riante through the spray of the shower.

"Good morning, angel," he said.

"How is my dear, dear manager?"

"Hungry," he said, stepping out and kissing her. "Golly, I never left such a mess before."

"I'll dry them," she said. "Stephen, do you realize marriage is a great institution?"

"Oh, very great."

On Friday of Peale's second week at Larus, Thomas Johnson asked Lowry to go to lunch with him. He said he had two things on his mind. He thought, as did Rutledge and the rest of them, that Lowry's progress or acclimatization had been so rapid and gratifying that, if it suited him, they would like him to make a quick inspection trip to Paris, Madrid, down to West Africa, back through Brazil

ASK ANY WOMAN

By MARCELENE COX

Money enables a man to get along without education, and education enables him to get along without money.

What would a woman do if suddenly deprived of breath with which to blow away cigar ashes, cracker crumbs, pine needles . . . and ordinary dust from the tops of tables?

Mothers must feel, frequently, that the same program is being carried on in their kitchens the birds practice outside in the yard. While one group eats another is ready to take up where it leaves off and a third is about to move in for the cleanup.

"I have promised my husband," confides the town's newest bride, "never to appear in public with my hair pinned up and my head wound with a scarf—which he calls the 'Getting-ready-for-Saturday-night' look."

Small girl to her mother: "I hope when you get old you won't get wrinkled and fat but be like grandmother; she still looks kind of new."

It isn't time that tells on a woman—it's her children.

The amazing thing about the family with eleven children, a mother who likes to sit a lot and visit, and a father often out of work, is that the children are all graduating from college.

Today's goal of achievement: one mate; two houses; three cars; four children.

Overheard: "If only I could get away from men for a while I would let my eyebrows grow out."

Some parents endeavor to color exactly a child's life in advance, the way a ghost artist with numbered sections dictates the picture to be painted.

Nagging: heat dissipated up the chimney.

and Venezuela, say five or six weeks altogether. The other thing was that Peale, who didn't know the plan yet, was anxious to have Lowry join him at Larus and see the setup for himself. Larus had some agents and distributors abroad whom they were not quite happy about and Peale felt that both economies and efficiencies would result from C.I.C.'s own subsidiaries' taking over. So, in short, could he go to Ohio and then make the longer trip?

"I imagine the question of your house and the children's coming over will concern you first. Have you found anything you like?" Johnson asked.

Lowry smiled. "We like the waters around Long Island and the space back in Connecticut. And what we like in Long Island is awfully expensive."

"Yes, I realize that. Of course special arrangements can be made ——"

"Mr. Rutledge spoke of that, but ——"

"You mustn't feel it's anything out of the ordinary. We expect our people to have a decent roof over their heads."

"I'd like to go to Larus very much to see the plant, and my mother lives on a farm near there and hasn't seen my wife since our arrival. She's anxious to have Rosalie and the children for the summer, and if I'm abroad it may be a good solution—that is, leaving the decision on our permanent home until I get back."

"The office can stir around while you're gone about a house, and Mrs. Lowry could always fly back from Ohio and have a look. So if it does suit you, will you please make arrangements accordingly?"

"Yes, with pleasure," he said.

Rosalie heard the news of the trip with mixed feelings. "I suppose we'll see a great deal of Jim and that does make me a little uneasy, but we'd better forget about the picture and the rest of it and start all over. If your mother's willing to have me and the children for the summer, she'd probably greatly prefer having them to herself. But I realize I must stay or the dear lambs will think we don't love them."

"I hate missing the summer with them, too," Lowry said.

"I know. It's precious having them and it's precious being alone. Oh, I'll be so glad when we get all settled where we're going to be."

Lowry had not seen his mother since her visit to them in Paris two years previously and he had never seen the farm she had bought and managed alone after his father's death. She was a slim elegance in tweeds and it was incredible that the woman who met the train was old enough to be his mother.

She linked her arm in Rosalie's and led the way to her small car. "Now," she said, "Stephen, you're to be delivered to the country club for breakfast with Jim and his manufacturers. Rosalie, can you wait to breakfast at the farm? We'll be there by eight."

"We had orange juice on the train," Rosalie said, "and I can wait hours. It's divine being here. I really loathe New York."

As they drove out of the tree-lined streets of the town past the lush farmlands and their well-painted houses with the low wooded hills rolling away northward under an enormous sky, the air smelling of earth and heaven, it was easy to feel this was the Promised Land. There was a sense of space and vigor about it. It flooded over him when he had kissed the two beautiful women in the car good-by and entered the country club.

Jim and two men, their chairs drawn together, were talking. They turned to hail him cordially and he saw that the third was D. P. Cramer.

"Hi, Steve," Jim said, "this is Les Burnham, of Larus, and I think you've met Mr. Cramer. Well, I guess we're all ready for breakfast."

Cramer said, "Yes, indeed," beamed from behind his glasses and shook hands cordially.

Burnham was a big fellow with a narrow head, long chin, long nose. He wore big steel-rimmed spectacles, had a big voice and a big, almost perpetual smile. He got up and with a hand in the middle of Lowry's back guided them toward the dining room.

It appeared from the talk that Burnham had been called to Washington on matters unconnected with the take-over of Larus and that details were not yet finally settled. Mergers were an area of business in which Lowry was not expert and he listened respectfully to the others. Two things particularly impressed him: one that the desire to buy was animated very slightly by Larus' condition that day, but what they felt it would be tomorrow; the other was the absence of pressure, trading, "chiseling" on both sides. Larus would be part of C.I.C. and its acquisition should be at a price which would leave its sellers, its management and buyers all happy. Thereafter the boundless future of American business would take care of things.

D. P. Cramer had begun to speak. He said first that in every plant he ever ran the door of the president's office was never closed. It was a symbol and more valuable as that than as a fact. Burnham said noisily they had some bad actors at Larus and always had had.

"You have to remember that they've got memories of many years of Pinkerton informers in the plant, right through the La Follette investigation," Cramer replied in his quiet undertone.

"I'd like you or anybody else to tell me how you run a plant without having someone to tell you what the men are talking about and what schemes for grievances they're up to."

"Well, in the first place, friend Burnham, you sign a union contract, and that's what I'm here to talk about," Cramer said.

"The thing is this, Les," Peale said: "our people all feel it's essential that there be a satisfactory labor contract before the company belongs to us."

"At how many dollars and cents an hour?"

"As high as, or a little higher than, what's paid anyplace else."

"And I suppose retroactive to the Year One?" Burnham asked.

"Well, certainly retroactive. Mr. Lowry told us of a valuable contract the Foreign Aid people had to cancel because the French unions were bitter about your nonunion politics."

"Now we have to please the Frogs, too, do we? I thought Mr. Lowry was here to tell me how we're going to increase our export business." In Burnham's ordinary words it was plain that he was hot under the collar, and Lowry felt considerable sympathy for him, taken suddenly to task about something Peale had evidently not raised before.

"I mentioned the French matter casually during a very general background discussion," he said. "We all feel a labor contract is essential, but that's a matter for you and Jim and Mr. Cramer to thrash out. The main reason I'm here is that I'm going abroad shortly and I want to learn as much about your machines and your sales as I can, and then see if our people can't do better."

"You're my man," Burnham said with his big smile. "I'm just a dirt mover and a good mechanic. I think trade-unions are a curse to the country. Let us get to the office, look over our records and get out to the demonstration lot and my labor-relations man can settle with our friends here any way they like and I'll sign it. Now what's your itinerary?"

"When was this decided?" Peale asked.

"Yesterday. It's comparatively short: six weeks, Paris, Madrid, West Africa, Brazil, Venezuela."

"Come on, let's go," Burnham said. "I want to show you our machines. You want any more coffee, Mr. Cramer?"

"I never take but one cup."

As they pushed back their chairs, Lowry said to Burnham, "Our Venezuelan agent writes me of a railroad bridge planned to start this year. If you're in the picture, I think C.I.C. is in a position to bid on the whole thing and it's of a magnitude of six million dollars."

"Now you're talking my language," Burnham said with a slap on the back.

Especially on Hot Foods...

The flavor of real butter is still nature's secret!

Why does real butter make such a big flavor difference on hot foods? Because it's churned from 100% real cream, of course. Real cream is the heart and soul of its goodness, the source of the subtle flavor that agrees with you always. Just like milk, real butter belongs on your family table—and your family deserves real butter as much as your guests. Serve the best—serve real butter.

BUTTERED STUFFED POTATOES: Slice top of hot baked potatoes. Scoop out potato, mash, beat in cream and butter until fluffy. Add diced pimento and green pepper. Season. Fill potato shells. Return to oven to lightly brown. Just before serving add pat of butter.

You never outgrow your need for foods made from milk!

"I don't want to throw cold water on it," Peale said, "but I don't think it's got any reality." As they went out to the car he said aside to Lowry, "Go easy on these plans."

At the plant Burnham got Mather, his labor-relations man, in his office, settled Cramer with Peale beside him and said to Mather, "Now forget everything I've ever said and do what Mr. Peale and Mr. Cramer tell you to do. I'll see you all at lunch." He told Lowry, "You may need a sweater on the lot. Strong wind."

"No, I'm a cold-climate graduate."

On the lot Burnham was at his best, operating everything from great excavators to post-hole diggers himself, demonstrating the marvelous adaptability of the machines. It was a wonderful morning of sun and air, and vigor, and by the end of it Lowry felt there was nothing C. I. C. needed so much as Larus.

At one o'clock, when they returned to the offices, they found the others had had sandwiches and coffee brought in, with a glass of milk for Cramer, who said they preferred to work straight through. Burnham asked a few questions and took Lowry off to the cafeteria.

They ate quickly and spent the rest of the afternoon reviewing contracts, sales records and order books. About four they went back to Burnham's office, where the three others were winding up their talk.

"I think we're done," Cramer said. "I have accepted, with some reluctance, Mr. Mather's view that it is best to await the next call from the union. He assures me it can be expected within a few days."

It was hard to know what Peale was thinking. He looked very tired.

"Well," Burnham said, "give me fifteen minutes with my mail and we'll go back to the club and bend the elbow a little."

Cramer declined, saying that his car was waiting to take him to Galion; Lowry said his mother was calling for Peale and him.

"Oh, I'd forgotten Mrs. Lowry was your mother. Wonderful woman," Burnham said. "Well, then, we'll see you and Jim in the morning."

Mrs. Lowry and Rosalie were waiting in the car.

"Did it go well?" Rosalie asked.

"How did it, Jim?" Lowry asked.

"All right," he said. "I'll have to come out to dinner later, Mrs. Lowry. If you can drop me at the club I've got some things to do and I must talk to New York."

"Do you want me to wait with you?" Lowry asked.

"No, not at all."

He was either so exhausted or disturbed about something that Lowry asked him in an undertone if anything had gone wrong. He shook his head and got out at the country club, looking almost ill.

"I'll come back for you," Lowry said in some concern.

"No. I've got one of those drive yourselfs."

"Jim, you're not ill, are you?" Rosalie said.

"Oh, no," he replied, but Lowry, looking at him, got out and walked up the steps.

"There must be something wrong, Jim. Don't feel you have to put on an act with us."

"Why do you say 'put on an act'?"

"I just mean if you're feeling sick, say so."

"I'm perfectly all right, I tell you."

Lowry had never seen the farm before, so it was not coming home in the true sense, but going into it gave him all the emotions of home-coming, of stability and of family. The house, built in 1840, had high-ceilinged rooms, high, broad-silled windows and a railed porch in front. To the left of the front door was Mrs. Lowry's farm office with a business desk and typewriter, filing cabinets, and agricultural-college reports. The rest of the downstairs was a lovely country house. The beauty and amenity obviously cost a great deal more than Lowry had expected his mother could afford, but he admired the independence with which she had done it and the self-reliance that had led her to live so well, though alone.

The three of them were in the living room awaiting Peale's arrival when the telephone rang and Mrs. Lowry went to her office to answer.

"I'm sure it's Jim, saying he can't come," Rosalie said. "What in the world has happened?"

From Mrs. Lowry's side of the conversation it was clear in a moment that she was right, and Lowry hurried to his mother.

"Let me speak to him," he said.

"But this is such a disappointment, my dear," she was saying. "We can really hold dinner as late as you like. Here's Stephen."

"I'm sorry," Peale said to him, "but I simply can't come. I'll give you a ring later."

The note of curt hostility in his voice was so marked that Lowry said, in some annoyance, to suit himself, and hung up.

The menu was the farm's own premium steak, its new potatoes, its water cress fresh from the brook, and its asparagus cut the hour before. It was all delicious, but each of them ate halfheartedly, puzzling over Peale.

When they finished their coffee in the living room and Mrs. Lowry took away the cups, saying she must have a word with her farmer, Rosalie said, "Darling, you don't suppose that I spoiled this in some way or other?"

"No, of course not, but I have the feeling I ought to go in and find out ——"

"Then why don't you?"

"Well, he plainly doesn't want me and I dislike barging in on him."

"I think I'll go up to bed and leave you to talk to your mother. She's been darling to me."

"The Stephen Lowrys never knew why they were unpopular," he said to his mother when she came back. "I should have thought Sally and her husband would have made a point of being here."

"My dear, I explained it to Rosalie. Sally and he are devoted to each other, but Robert's life is not an easy one."

"I know they have a hard time financially."

"It is the fact that that very dear man, each day of his life, has you held up as the final repository of wisdom, knowledge and valor. I don't read psychology, but I think your dear sister suffers from brother-images."

"Speaking of money, are you all right, as they say?"

"My dear, I take better care of money than almost anyone you know. I can live this way because I do an enormous amount of work myself. So don't worry."

She looked up to see Rosalie in robe and nightdress in the doorway.

"Can I come in?"

"Oh, I should say. It'll be much more interesting with you here."

"Stephen, I know it's none of my business, but I have the strongest feeling you ought to go in and see what's the matter with Jim."

He got to his feet. "Actually, so do I," he said. "I'll call him first, I think."

He was at the telephone when they heard a car stop in the driveway, the farm dog barking, followed by a ring at the bell.

Mrs. Lowry went to the door and they heard her say, "Why, Jim, how wonderful. We were just talking about you."

Rosalie, conscious of her attire, started to go as Mrs. Lowry brought him in. To Lowry he looked much more himself than he had since breakfast. His manner was more composed and he said he was sorry at missing dinner and glanced only casually at Rosalie's negligee.

"I'll tell you what happened, Steve. I talked to Tom Johnson and got him to agree to Les'

One of the chief causes of lack of zest is the feeling that one is unloved, whereas conversely the feeling of being loved promotes zest more than anything else does. General self-confidence toward life comes more than anything else from being accustomed to receive as much of the right sort of affection as one has need for.

and my signing the final papers—which we've done—subject to an oral understanding on an immediate labor contract. I'm getting the train at eleven for New York, and you and Les can wind up without me, but I did want to say good-by."

Peale said he felt a great relief at getting it all settled. Then he continued, "You see, I wasn't sure how much Cramer has rubbed Les the wrong way and I thought it advisable to get him out of the picture as quickly as possible. And I think Les was pleased and took it as a vote of confidence. Now I must beat it. Good night, Mrs. Lowry, and many thanks."

She kissed him and he turned to Rosalie, making herself inconspicuous in the corner of the sofa. She quickly put out a hand and wished him luck. Lowry walked out to the car with him. When he came back, Rosalie had gone upstairs and Mrs. Lowry was switching off the lamps. She raised her eyebrows to her son. He shrugged and kissed her good night.

Rosalie was in bed in a jewel of a room bright with pretty lamps and mirrors, a bowl of flowers, and French-blue draperies drawn. He took off his coat and slowly undid his tie. "I suppose that while it's all true, it isn't the whole story. I never felt more in the dark in my life," he said.

Larus contracts with foreign representatives were cancelable on thirty days' notice and Burnham sent out such notices the next day after further talk with Lowry. Though there was no urgency and they would have liked to stay at least another day at the farm, Lowry felt they had better take the train that night.

At the office Lowry found that Peale had gone to Washington and that the results of the trip had pleased everyone.

"Tell me, Steve," Rutledge asked; "Jim didn't seem to mind Cramer's sitting in too much, did he?"

"No, though actually I didn't see a great deal of Cramer."

"He's an effective fellow. I don't think he liked Jim's sudden decision to sign Burnham that night, but we all felt it was very good judgment. We're going to try to get Jim away for a holiday. He seemed awfully edgy, but he's done a wonderful job and he tells me you were a tower of strength."

"Well, hardly that, but Burnham and I got along well."

"Good, there'll be lots more when you get back. Nothing like team play."

When Lowry let himself into the apartment rather early a few afternoons later he heard a rumble of voices from the living room. He looked in to see Rosalie in the midst of an English lesson with four of her Estonians, waved and went to bathe and change.

The lesson ended and her pupils departed as he finished dressing. Rosalie came in and, to his amazement, dropped into a chair, bursting into tears.

"Why, darling, what in the world?" he asked, his arm around her shoulder.

"Oh, Stephen, one of them was sure she had met Inge and mother in Rotterdam last year and then it turned out not to be true."

"She was sure it wasn't true?"

"Yes; the name was different and I had misunderstood some Estonian word. They were two cousins—older women. Oh, it's happened so often!"

"I know, darling."

"I think I'll lie down awhile. Get me an aspirin, please."

Half an hour later she joined him in the living room in a round-necked cotton dress and sandals. "I'm all right," she said. "Sorry to have been a baby. Tell me 'What are the men saying?'"—a phrase in their private idiom.

"Well, they're not saying much. The Larus union contract came through and everybody's very pleased. Jim has had to go to Washington again, and may not be back before I leave. I had the benefit of some fatherly advice, however. Incidentally, he's looking perfectly ghastly."

"He told me the other night he had lost ten pounds."

"I don't understand it. When we got back Rutledge was going to send him off for a rest and now he tells me Jim refuses to go."

"Perhaps I could have found out. He called and begged me to have lunch with him today. He sounded so unhappy that I think I would have if he hadn't suddenly said something about how I looked when he came in at your mother's."

"Where'd he call you from?" Lowry asked.

"I don't know where. Speaking of lunching or dinner, dear, when did you have dinner with Calvin Hewitt? Paula told me all about it. Not that I mind, because I think he often has dinner with bad little girls. But for the life of me I couldn't remember when it was."

"Did you tell her that?"

"No, I didn't want her to think you hadn't come home and raved about what a great fellow he was. He says you're a wonderful talker, impress everybody and have a great future. But when was all this?"

"I'm ashamed to say it never was. Hewitt asked me some time ago to let him tell Paula that he and I were having dinner together ——"

"So he could be out with some woman?" Rosalie asked.

"I suppose so."

"Why didn't you tell me?"

"I warned him that I wouldn't tell you and have you involved."

"Very noble, I must say. You thought nothing of letting Paula be deceived—I suppose he would 'help you out' next time."

"Certainly not, but I didn't weigh all the ethical considerations. It's the sort of thing that happens ——"

"You mean all men do this?"

"No, I don't, but certainly many do and more have done it on occasions."

"May I know whether you do it with me, or am I supposed to take it for granted and not ask?"

"I have never done it with you and never will."

"Stephen, if Paula had told me that you had done this, I'd have sworn she was mistaken. I realize you think I'm magnifying it out of all proportion. But I was as eager all day to be with you tonight as though we had been separated for months. I took it for granted we were somehow so miraculously still in love that ——"

"Aren't we?"

"But, you see, feeling that way, I also took it for granted that we were both loyal to . . . well, love itself. This is a terrible thing to say to you, but protecting Hewitt in this is not greatly different from helping him find a girl, is it?"

"That is a rather terrible thing to say. I don't think I deserve it."

"I don't suppose you do, but it's rather a terrible thing you've done to me too."

"Is it irreparable?" he asked coldly.

"Please don't take that tone."

"Well, is it irreparable? Or do there have to be weeks or months of expiation because I couldn't make a speech on sexual ethics at the end of an officers' meeting?"

"You don't need to be so injured. You could be understanding as you usually are ——"

"It's difficult, I suppose, because I am ashamed of it."

She was silent a moment and then said, "Well, stop being. I've made an awful time about it but I really understand how it happened, and I'm sorry I made you feel badly. Only let's not, well, you know—let the business ruin our lives. Come to think of it, poor Paula had a little happiness out of it."

Many uneventful transatlantic flights had not sufficed to give Lowry any confidence that the triumph of aerodynamics in which he and sixty other people were contained would not fall out of the skies and burst into flames. He envied the men who could talk business for sixteen hours with time out for refreshing naps, the others who finished their paper books just as the aircraft touched down. He had never been able to read comfortably on a plane.

He smiled as the "purser" gave him his dinner tray and applied himself to its rare delicacies with what relish he could.

His brother-in-law, Armas Lainvee, was waiting with his car at Orly, as handsome as Rosalie was beautiful, with a striking resemblance to her. They greeted each other affectionately and Armas handed him a cable.

"Your office sent it around," he said.

Lowry tore it open. It was dated from Caracas, Venezuela, and read:

GRATEFUL IF YOU WOULD AGREE TO MY COMING TO PARIS AT MY OWN EXPENSE WHILE YOU ARE THERE FOR PRIVATE REASONS. CAN ARRIVE IN THREE DAYS. DARAN

"I might as well reply now," Lowry said. "Our Venezuelan agent wants to meet me here."

They stopped for him to cable his agreement and a message to Rosalie and went out to the car. It was only fair, Lowry had always felt, that there should be something to mar the beauty of Paris, and certainly the drive from Orly into the city was about as ugly as any in the world. Then the car crossed the Seine into the incredible city, discharged Lainvee at his office in the Boulevard Haussmann, moved toward the Bois and out to the Lainvee house back of the trees in the quiet Avenue Henri Martin.

By the time Lowry had bathed and shaved, his clothes had been pressed, his linen put away, his shoes polished. He moved with a sense of well-being and a profound respect for the living standards of the wealthy.

He found Piccard, the head of the Paris office, a fussy man who seemed a little over his head in his job. Everything about the office except the wage scale confirmed Rutledge's views on European commercial inefficiency, and Lowry considered with apprehension how long it would take to make all the necessary changes.

Back at the Lainvee house he got a call through to the children in Switzerland and the sound of their excited, happy voices brought tears to his eyes.

The night before his arrival Daran cabled from New York, giving his flight number and arrival time. Lowry felt there was good will to be earned by meeting him at Orly and ordered a limousine to take him out alone. The New York plane was already in and Lowry asked an attendant to inform Mr. Daran that he was waiting.

He had smoked one cigarette when from behind a high truckload of baggage propelled by two porters a man appeared whom he recognized, from a picture in the New York office, as Daran.

A more suavely theatrical figure he had never seen. He was of medium height, slim and graceful. He wore a good sports jacket and slacks. Sleek, black hair was parted in the middle and his shaggy black brows were in contrast to his neat mustache. He carried a walking stick which Lowry felt sure was a sword cane. With him was a young woman.

He greeted Lowry in precise English. Turning to the young woman, he said casually, "Mr. Lowry, I have the honor to present you to the Señorita Beatriz María Inclan y Cespedes, natural daughter of the late benemérito jefe, Juan Vicente Inclan. She is my mistress. I feel it best to be completely frank with you."

"Thank you, I am honored," Lowry said and kissed the offered hand of the señorita. Her figure, her dark, melting eyes were in the Carmen tradition, but her clothes were both expensive and well chosen, her voice low-pitched and agreeable, her English excellent. The flaw in her looks, however, was considerable. Her nose was that of a battered prize fighter.

Daran continued, "You will doubtless have wondered about her nose. I myself find it piquant. To her it is distressing. Many of the late jefe's children have inherited his nose, as Franz Josef's did the Hapsburg lip. In a sense both are the marks of the blood royal. Now let us be off. We have reservations at the Ritz."

To give pleasure to a single heart by a single kind act is better than a thousand head-bowings in prayer.
SAADI

Beatriz interrupted the speech to say how very kind it was of Mr. Lowry to come to meet them.

"You will think me quite rude not to have said that before," Daran said. "The fact is I think I did not thank you for coming because I felt worried as to how you were going to regard my bringing Beatriz. Does it offend you? I assure you the company's interests in Venezuela will not suffer."

"Of that I am sure. Mr. Peale has given us very fine reports about you ——"

"Has he indeed?"

"Oh, yes, and as for ——"

"I was never sure he quite trusted me."

"You may be sure, and I am delighted you have been able to bring the señorita. Did you see any of our people in New York?"

"No, we went from Pan-Am to Air France at Idlewild in a matter of moments."

Lowry's chauffeur came forward.

"I have a car waiting," Lowry said.

"I had arranged for one also," Daran said.

This is a very thorough and competent fellow, Lowry thought and, anxious to learn more about him and the señorita, he agreed to drive into the city with them and dismissed his own car.

"I must explain," Daran said, "that the main reason for our voyage is that Beatriz enters the hospital here in the morning."

"I'm sorry to hear this. I hope it isn't too serious."

"No," Beatriz said. "Would you like to know what they're going to do?"

"If you'd like to tell me," he said.

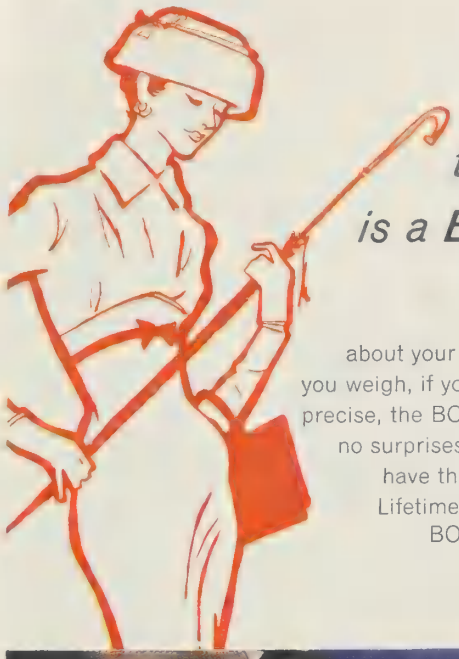
"George won the national lottery and took me to Mexico on holiday. He wanted to give me a large diamond or a sable coat. I refused."

"Oh?"

"I said I would very much rather have plastic surgery on my nose. It is so ugly and spoils my face. The cost of coat and the operation was what George calls 'even Stephen.' Do you know what that means?"

"Yes."

"So it is to be done and I may be beautiful. Who knows, he may want me to marry him, though I don't think it likely. Mr. Lowry, is your wife beautiful?"



"Very."

"How long have you been married?"

"Oh, thirteen years."

"And you are not tired of each other?"

"I think not."

"I worry about that because in Venezuela so many women cannot hold their husbands as lovers because they let themselves remain stupid and become fat. Is your wife American?"

"No, but very Americanized in many ways now."

"That is interesting. George is European, you know. I'm not sure he knows where he was born."

"I have told you where I was born. Now this is what I suggest," Daran said as the Ritz bagagistes unloaded the luggage. "We must confirm our arrival to the hospital. Beatriz enters in the morning. Will you not come back to dine with us at eight?"

"Please do, Mr. Lowry," Beatriz said.

"Actually I am booked to dine with our Paris manager."

"Well then, if you agree, I shall come to the office to see you as soon as the result of the operation is known in the morning."

"Good," Lowry replied, "but let everything wait until you are at ease about the señorita. And now the best of luck to you both." Lowry smiled, shook their hands and got in the car.

He was amused by how much he felt drawn to them both. Their special appeal arose not so much from their fantastic plans and situation as from the casual gravity with which they announced them and the matter-of-fact but apparently ardent attachment between them. Daran gave the impression of being one of those few men able to manage the rational and irrational sides of his life as a unit.

He heard from but did not see Daran until the second day following. The plastic surgery was reported as almost certainly successful and the señorita as happy and eager.

Daran appeared at the office all business. He was enthusiastic about the acquisition of Larus. Daran believed that his special contribution to the success of Larus would be his spare-parts control and perpetual inventory. The layout he showed Lowry would have been acceptable on the River Rouge itself. As to the regular lines, he did not feel he was getting the deliveries he should. He had made the point strongly to Mr. Peale. When he had heard of Lowry's appointment he had been very happy, feeling that at last there would be some one person in New York to fight his battles and insure prompt deliveries of all he could sell. He gave an equally favorable report on collections and credit losses. He had a great deal to say about the proposed bridge and his hopes for the contract.

Lowry listened attentively to it all. "There is no reason," he asked, "to suppose the bridge proposed lacks reality?"

"Oh, most certainly not."

"Mr. Peale seemed to have doubts of it," Lowry told him.

"Oh, I think you are mistaken, if you will forgive me. Mr. Peale could have heard nothing of it when he was there. I myself had not until just after New Year's when I wrote you."

"Then I must have misunderstood him. Looking ahead, do you want to make Venezuela your permanent home?"

"Certainly not," Daran replied, "if only for the reason that I should not want seventy-nine half brothers- and sisters-in-law hanging around my house. I must tell you that yesterday I told Beatriz I desired to marry her, irrespective of the outcome of the operation. It was due largely to your acceptance of her and her easy behavior with you. For that I am very grateful."

"I congratulate you," Lowry said. Daran, he thought, arrives by processes of thought at the sort of decisions I reach by impulse.

"Have you something in mind as to a change?" Daran asked.

"Not immediately, but I shall think about it," Lowry replied. He had thought a good deal about it as Daran had produced his reports, while still trying to recall Peale's exact words about the bridge.

"Will you be my guest at dinner tonight? I shall naturally be a little lonely and Beatriz has suggested I dine and go watch 'les girls' in a night club. It seems a good suggestion. She does not fear rivalry, but would herself be ashamed to see a spectacle. That of course arises from having lived remote from centers of civilization."

"I propose you dine with my brother-in-law, Armas Lainvee, and me at Laurent's."

"With pleasure, and you will be my guests at the spectacle?"

"Well, we'll see."

That night, as they drove to Laurent's, Lowry told his brother-in-law what was in his mind about Daran. They found him awaiting them, viewing his surroundings with evident satisfaction.

"I think Mr. Peale mentioned this restaurant," he said.

Lowry said he had brought Peale there several years ago. "Its greatest attraction is that you lunch or dine in the midst of forest trees in the very heart of Paris."

As they ate the long, delicious meal, Lainvee, with considerable skill, kept Daran talking about himself. He was born in 1923 in Europe—he did not specify the country. He had been captured by the Russians in June, 1940, while fighting, as a boy of sixteen, in the Lithuanian army.

"My sister, Mrs. Lowry, and I were with our family in Tallin that month ——"

Daran put down his knife and fork. "You are Estonian?"

"Yes, of course. Why?"

Daran hesitated an instant and said, "I suppose I thought your name was French." There was a slight change in his manner and he ate his artichoke in meditative silence.

As man is now constituted, to be brief is almost a condition of being inspired.

SANTAYANA

"So far as we know, only my sister and I survived that dreadful month," Lainvee went on. "Nothing has ever been heard of my father or mother or other sister, though I have never given up hope. I went to Bonn last week to talk to some returned prisoners of war."

"I meant to tell you that Rosalie went at once to the Estonian Relief in New York," Lowry said to his brother-in-law, "and for a brief moment one day she thought she had word."

"You escaped with Madame Lowry, Monsieur Lainvee?"

"No. I was with our forces at the frontier when I was taken. She escaped alone from Tallin to Sweden and ultimately to Norway sometime in July, '40."

"She was in the Norwegian Resistance when I met her there on a mission," Lowry said.

"I see," Daran said.

"We were united here in Paris as a result of my chancing to meet Lowry at a party given by the Marshall Plan people for French bankers," Lainvee told him.

"I shall always include your family in inquiries I make about mine," Daran said.

"Thank you; I shall do the same for you if you will give me the details while you're here," Lainvee replied. "But let us talk of less unhappy things."

"Just to be clear in my inquiries, it was from the Russians, not the Nazis, that Madame Lowry escaped?"

"Oh, from the Russians, yes," Lowry said, "a year before the Nazi invasion."

Daran nodded. They had finished with the finger bowls, after the artichokes, before he spoke again. "In 1946 I worked my way on a ship to Venezuela and since then things have gone well for me. I may say I worked hard to make them."

"What sort of passport do you have?" Lainvee asked.

"Oh, I am now a Venezuelan national."

Daran's reservation was the only empty table in the crowded night club when they arrived. They edged their way to it and Daran ordered the required champagne. The girls were astonishingly young and lovely and Lowry and his brother-in-law stared at them with no less interest than Daran, or than the other men and women of the audience.

Daran, sitting between them, drank some champagne. "What I like best about a spectacle of this sort is the philosophical questions it raises in my mind. Have the women in the audience come because they do not trust their husbands without them? Not entirely, I think. They are too curious to see. I could not permit Beatriz to do this. And if she were here with us, it would make her unhappy that I so much enjoy looking at them."

"Didn't she suggest your coming?" Lainvee asked.

"Oh, yes, but in a tender, generous moment without thinking," Daran replied. "That sketch we are watching—very wicked, no doubt, but I don't find it offensive, do you?"

"No, very amusing."

"Mr. Peale would not approve. He is a man of fine culture."

"Oh, come," Lowry said. "Peale enjoyed himself very much with me in just such a place in Paris."

"He gave me the impression of great strictness in Caracas, though he did talk one night in the Café India about the relations of men and women. Do you know, I never mentioned Beatriz to him. I felt he would not trust my business judgment, if he knew. With you, of course, I had no alternative."

"I don't believe he would have felt it was any of his business," Lowry said.

"Oh, I think he would have. He told me a story —— I forget."

Lowry saw his brother-in-law turn to look at Daran. It was obvious he had not forgotten the story, but had quickly veered off it. Lowry wondered what it was.

As they came out of the night club to Lainvee's car, Daran said he would get in last, since he was getting out first at the Ritz—or would they like to go to another club? They both yawned and said tomorrow had already arrived. Daran sank back in the car.

His companions were so quiet that Lowry thought they had dozed off, but as the car stopped at the Ritz, Daran bounded out, leaned in to shake hands with Lainvee and said, "Mr. Lowry, may I have a word with you, please?"

Lowry got out. Daran seemed suddenly ill at ease.

"Mr. Lowry, there is a very serious matter I must talk to you about in the morning. I shall be back from the hospital by a quarter before twelve. I should not like to discuss it at the office. Would you be good enough to come here to our sitting room?"

"Yes," Lowry said. "What is it about?"

"That is what I shall have to ask you."

"I see," Lowry replied. "Do we have to be mysterious at two in the morning?"

"I am sorry. I must take it in phases. The first phase was bringing myself to mention it at all."

"Very well. I'll be here just before noon."

Daran called another good night to Lainvee.

"What did you think of him?" Lowry asked his brother-in-law, in the car.

"I don't know. What did he want with you just now?"

"He had something to tell me tomorrow which he says is very important. I have no idea what it is. He's an interesting and likable little fellow, but as to my idea that he might be given the Paris office ——"

"Well, I shouldn't judge from this evening. I think there's a good deal to him, and of one thing I think you can be certain. He is not a chicaneur."

The concierge at the Ritz said that Mr. Daran had left word that Mr. Lowry was to wait in his sitting room. Daran arrived with profuse apologies, saying that though the bandages had not been removed from Beatriz, the surgeon was very confident.

"I am so happy," Daran said, "about the operation that I would like to take it as an omen that what I have now to discuss will be resolved as fortunately. Even now I feel considerable hesitancy in mentioning it." There was no question that he was more than hesitant. His manner was troubled, and he moved nervously around the room.

"Have no hesitancy," Lowry said; "we're friends. Say or ask whatever you like."

"Thank you. You are kind." He seated himself. "Mr. Lowry, is it proper for me to know what the Morval Project is? If not, then I have no more to say."

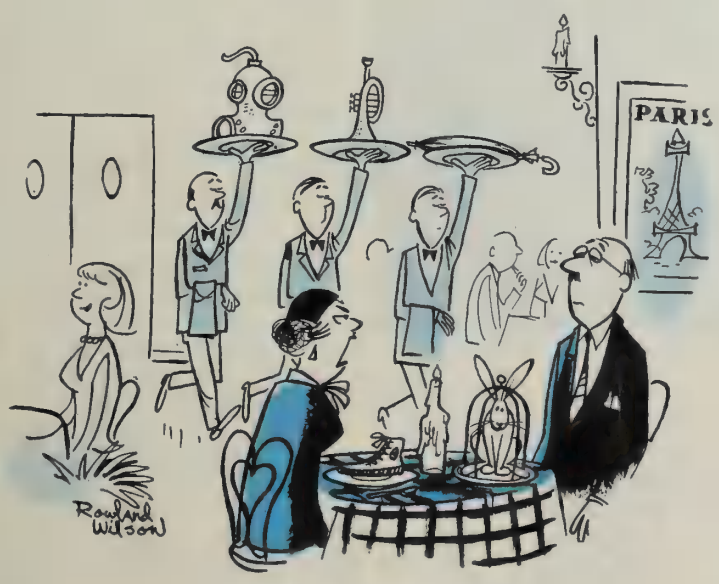
"I can't answer that," Lowry replied, "because I never heard of it."

"Does an amount, a special draft or check, that is to say, of fifty thousand dollars suggest anything?"

"Fifty thousand dollars? No. Whose draft? Where?"

"The company in Caracas."

"Originated by whom?"



There was almost a moment's silence, then Daran said, "Mr. Peale on his visit last autumn."

"What you say means nothing to me, but it's quite possible that I know it under another name or that it's some completed transaction I've never heard of. Suppose you tell me why all this comes up."

"Mr. Lowry, I am not trying to make a bargain with you, but if it turns out that my concern, actually my worry about it, is all nonsense, will you say no more about it? I do not want you to think me an alarmist, an informer—a busybody, shall we say?"

"I shan't. Go ahead."

Daran shifted an ash tray and a package of cigarettes on the table beside him. "You are doubtless aware," he said, "that in Venezuela the company has made some confidential political contributions and several times set aside sums for some form of social welfare—a clinic at the hospital, substantial prizes for farm improvement, that sort of thing. This may be such a matter which Mr. Peale did not feel I needed to be informed of. When it occurred, I asked no questions. But because of the ledger I felt it proper to write Mr. Peale on three occasions after he left asking for his instructions.

"You and your perfect French!"

Here are my letters." He opened his briefcase, selected a folder and handed it to Lowry.

Lowry read and returned them. "What did Mr. Peale write you?"

"He has never replied."

"I see. Tell me exactly how it began. What was done, what was said?"

"Mr. Peale came back to the office after a meeting with the Minister of Roads and Communications and asked me to draw a check in favor of Morval Project for fifty thousand dollars. At the same moment he began to dictate a report on his meeting to my secretary. When I came back with the check and the voucher for his approval, he took the check, initialed the voucher without breaking his dictation. I asked whether there should be any memorandum with the voucher for the auditors to see. He shook his head, looked at me with a smile and put his finger to his lips."

"What did he say about it later?"

"He never mentioned it."

"Did you?"

"Mr. Lowry, I was in a difficult position. I did not want to be told it was none of my business and I felt that was just what I would be told. I felt convinced that there were good reasons for special silence about it."

"It occurs to me at once that Morval Project may be code for the bridge and that, with all due regard, Mr. Peale was told of it in confidence by the minister before you were—and that the voucher has something to do with it. What, I don't know."

"That, of course, occurred to me, but I have reason to be sure there is no connection. Here is the original voucher and check," Daran said, taking them out of his briefcase.

Lowry examined the check. It was endorsed in Peale's handwriting "Morval Project," and then with his name, and had been deposited in Maduro's Bank on the day of its date.

"And?" Lowry asked, handing back the papers.

"When I received your cable that I might come to Paris, I prepared a memorandum of matters to take up with you. Morval Project was one. As soon as I got your cable I hurried to Maduro's Bank to buy my travelers' checks. Monty Maduro and I are good friends, and while I waited for the checks I decided to ask him about the Morval account. Of course I gave no hint of any concern about it, simply asking in an offhand manner. His answer has troubled me deeply, though I am sure New York's reply to you will show me to be a great worrier about nothing."

"What did he say?"

"'Oh, that I remember,' he said. 'It was an in-and-out transaction. We made a telegraphic transfer to an account of Mr. Peale's in New York that day.'"

"What had Mr. Peale told him?"

"Nothing at all. He was very affable, talked about conditions and asked Monty to handle this personal matter for him. Well, I have unburdened myself. I feel better."

Lowry got up. "As you say, I am sure we shall have an answer from New York clearing it all up in the morning. I do think Mr. Peale is to be criticized for leaving you so much in the dark. I'm sorry you have had this worry."

"You're entirely frank with me in not saying I have done the wrong thing?"

"Entirely," Lowry said, shook hands with him and left, himself troubled but yet confident the explanation would be satisfactory. He decided on a personal cable to Peale:

DARAN INQUIRING ABOUT MORVAL PROJECT TRANSACTION. AS I AM IN DARK MYSELF WOULD APPRECIATE YOUR PUTTING AT LEAST ME IN THE PICTURE.

He asked for a reply to Lainvee's house. It came promptly that afternoon reading:

FORGET MORVAL ALL IN ORDER.

In the interval before the cable came he had begun to feel grave anxiety about the transaction. Either there was a quick satisfactory explanation to him, if not to Daran, or it appeared that $50,000 had been embezzled.

Troubled and anxious while he waited for the reply, Lowry's feelings on reading its smug brevity were of anger as well as anxiety. And it left him in a ridiculous position vis-á-vis Daran. He wrote a reply to go to Peale's apartment:

IN VIEW OF TELEGRAPHIC TRANSFER TO YOU WHEREOF DARAN NOW AWARE YOU MUST SEE MATTER CANNOT BE DISMISSED AS YOU HAVE. I DON'T MIND TELLING HIM TO FORGET IT IF I AM TOLD WHAT IT IS. NATURALLY DO NOT SUGGEST ANYTHING IMPROPER ABOUT IT BUT IT DEMANDS FULL CLARIFICATION AND I WON'T LEAVE IT OTHERWISE. SURE THIS IN BEST INTERESTS OF ALL. HOWEVER IF RUTLEDGE OR JOHNSON CABLES ME PERSONALLY TO DISREGARD WILL AGREE ADVISING DARAN THEREOF. REGARDS.

There was no reply by the second morning following. If, as seemed inevitable, the silence implied a fraud, Lowry felt it impossible to break the whole matter to Rutledge or Johnson by cable. After waiting until eleven o'clock he went to Lainvee's office to put the matter before him. Lainvee listened with raised eyebrows.

"Plainly you must clear it up," he said.

"I agree, but there's always the possibility that Jim is out of town or hasn't got my second cable. I owe it to him not to be precipitate."

"He owed it to you to answer originally, but I realize how you feel. Could you cable the company, possibly in these words, 'Advise me of any developments in Morval situation Caracas.' If it is a company matter they will say so. If not, you haven't put Peale on the spot. Have you any reason to believe he would embezzle money?"

"Put that way, no," Lowry replied. "But in view of minor things, in a way equally disturbing, I feel considerably alarmed."

"Such as what things?"

"Well, some of the things he has said and done suggest he's either ill or under an unusual strain. Yet his standing with the senior officers is very high." Lowry added, "I think I will cable the office as you suggest. I must tell Daran something by tomorrow at the latest."

"And if it turns out to be a very ugly thing, what will you tell him?" Lainvee asked.

"I can only hope it won't come to that. There must be an explanation."

But when the company's answer to his cable came about five o'clock it read, "Question not clear what or who is Morval." He replied to them, "Must return briefly to New York leaving tomorrow night," and cabled Peale at his apartment and Rosalie to the same effect. Though there seemed no alternative, he was still half sure he was making a fool of himself about nothing and that when he faced Rutledge, Johnson and Peale they would say, "Oh, Morval, of course, the word was garbled in transmission. Morval is the confidential project the directors decided on ——"

He telephoned Daran asking him to wait at the Ritz the next morning for him and went there at ten.

"I have been in touch with New York about Morval and as it is difficult to give the whole story by cable I've decided to go back for a day or so, since there are several other matters that need decision," he said. "I'll probably be back before you're ready to go."

He could see that Daran knew this was not the full story, but Daran replied, "I am afraid I've put you to a lot of trouble about something that is not gran cosa. You do understand I felt I must speak of it?"

"Of course. You have done exactly the proper thing. Beatriz progresses?"

"Oh, yes, very well indeed." He hesitated. "I hope I shall not have lost Mr. Peale's good will by my interference. If you can, Mr. Lowry, you will let me know, please, as soon as possible whatever I should know about Morval and, if I may say so, I believe Monty Madurp should be informed."

"I shall do both," Lowry said.

A hired car was waiting and Lowry told the chauffeur to take him back to the company's office, where for the rest of the day he listened to Piccard's complaints and frustrations.

Early in the morning of the first Tuesday in May, Rosalie answered the telephone to find Colonel Channing was calling.

"About a house," he said. "I happened to see one for sale over the weekend you may like. I made some inquiries and the reports are good. However, it's thirty-five years old."

"Oh, where is it?" she asked breathlessly.

"Well, it's in Ridingtown, Long Island. Now of course the place isn't what it was. It's overcrowded and no longer distinguished socially. But it has lots of nice people Steve would know, and even a few fourth-generation families are left. It has climate and salt-water sailing and I don't quite see how, in an incorporated village like it, this house could become less desirable, certainly not in the next twenty-five years."

"How much? What type?"

"Asking price, forty—French farmhouse. Can I drive you out to see it this afternoon?"

"Oh, would you? What about a school?"

"A very good private school close by. I must warn you that with lilacs, apple blossoms and dogwood all out, any place this week in May looks better than it is. And this hasn't 'a view.'"

"Never mind—how much land?"

"Not much, two acres."

Channing approached the house by the roundabout sand road "around the water." Its gate was on a lane off the main roads, and as Channing turned the car into its gravel drive. there was no doubt in Rosalie's mind that this was where she wanted to live. The whitewashed brick wall on three sides, the high hedge along the lane gave a wonderful seclusion. And as for "a view," miles of sunlit tidal waters were visible from the second-floor windows. There were enough maples and birches in one corner for windfall logs for the winter, and the apple and dogwood trees were in full blossom. The air smelled of sea and lilacs and cedars, the last, with their burgeoning branches, looking like Victorian ladies—and Rosalie wondered why people ever smoked so much they could not smell the springtime or the sea.

Trees and walls and hedge were far enough off for the sun to light each of the rooms at some hour of the day and, now westering, it came through the French doors of the long sitting room. Rosalie looked around, mentally placed lamps and furniture, bought curtains and carpets, asking Channing how many bedrooms and baths. When she had scampered upstairs to see them she called down with peasant thrift, "Will they take thirty-five, three thousand in cash?" Channing thought they might.

So after a stop at the agent's she was driven back to New York in high spirits to cable Stephen, only to find his cable announcing his return. He gave no reason and she thought merely what a lucky break. She was making lists at her desk in the apartment when the doorbell rang and, answering it, she found Peale waiting. Bubbling over with excitement, she started to tell him at once of the house.

"Aren't you delighted for us?" she asked. "And, best of all, Stephen's coming back."

She motioned him to a chair. His outward appearance was faultless as always, but his handsome face had a haggard intensity. She remained standing, leaning against a table, and then broke off her ecstatic description of the house to say, "Jim, is something the matter? You seem all queer."

He leaned forward, elbows on his knees, looking down at his clasped hands between them. "No, nothing's the matter," he said very quietly. "There are several things I have to tell you. I wish you would make it easier by sitting down. I wanted you to have dinner with me. Then I thought possibly you'd fix something for us here, so we could be alone."

"But, my dear man, I have no desire to be alone with you and I have a thousand things to do about the house and Stephen's arrival."

"Do you know why he's coming back?"

"No, not really. I mean, no, not at all."

He got up and, still very quietly, said, "You know I'm desperately in love with you ——"

"Now you must really go. I can't listen to such things. Come now, off with you," she said as though she were sending a child away.

"What is your feeling for me?"

"Stephen thinks you're his closest friend and so I am a friend of yours, but I shan't be if you go on."

"I think Stephen is coming back because of me."

"Oh, you can't have told him such nonsense."

"I have told no one, not even Evvy, who has left me. I couldn't live with her, wanting you as I do."

"But this is monstrous," she said. "I won't listen to it."

"I think you must listen to it," he said. "Stephen cabled me he is coming back about a business matter that I bungled. It could have been set right, if he hadn't made this headlong decision to return. He must have realized that. Therefore, I'm afraid it's something else. I'm afraid he must have been told something that I said about you. I want to beg you to forgive me. I hope you'll have some pity."

"Tell me exactly what Stephen may have heard. How could you have told him anything he didn't know?"

"Wrong as I have been, let me kiss you—please, please."

"Don't come near me. Tell me this thing you've said."

He regained control of himself and spoke again in a matter-of-fact tone. "I was with a man who seemed to have devoted his life to the pursuit of women. It was after dinner in a café. We had had a great deal to drink. He had story after story of his experiences; I realized how little I knew of such things. I think I wanted to impress him. He told me about being at the opera in Berlin shortly after the occupation. A Russian general came in with a beautiful German girl, dripping with sables and jewels. He dwelt on the Russian and the courtesan with him and I told him I knew of a similar thing. I said there was an Estonian girl, of whom I knew, who had married an American officer, letting him believe she had been violated by the Russians in Tallin whereas actually she had been the acquiescent mistress of their general."

He said it all as though it were nothing. He had spoken of something which the years and Stephen's love had let her seal away, yet which lay silent at the base of her feeling of insecurity in America. Even in her cold horror, she felt the deep warmth of gratitude to Stephen that he had never asked and gradually dispelled all need to speak or even think of it.

"I mentioned no names," Peale was saying. "It was simply that you were the only woman I knew—I hadn't met you yet—who had been under the Russians."

She said a silent prayer to let her forgive him for Stephen's sake. Then the thought flashed through her mind, how could he know what had happened to her in Tallin? Stephen could never for all their closeness have mentioned even the fringe of it.

"You made this up. But why, why did you think any such thing happened to me?"

"Your brother, Armas, said one night in Paris that you had suffered greatly before you escaped."

"I suffered. I had lost my whole family, everything."

"I knew there was more when Stephen first sent a picture of you."

"Why will he have had to hear this?" she asked exhaustedly.

"I told it to Daran in Caracas last fall. Daran likes to talk of women. He is certain to have told it over a drink, as I did."

"Why have you come to me? What did you expect I would do?"

"I came because I needed and want you and because you have been in peril and I never have. I know in my soul it's this story I've told and nothing else that brings Stephen back—and perhaps I hoped that this was fate's way of bringing us together."

She turned to look at him. Sick as he must be, there was really so little change in his face since she first saw it New Year's Eve, no sign in it of the monstrous thoughts which went on behind its mask.

"I stole that picture of you in the sun. It never leaves me," he said.

"I knew that," she said quietly. "So does Stephen. You must give it back to me now as your first atonement."

Slowly he reached in his breast pocket for his wallet and took it out.

"Put it on the table," she said, fearing to take it lest she touch him. She rubbed her lips, trying to sort out the confusion in her mind, overwhelmed with pity for Stephen. True or false, the effect of this story would last forever and it would be she who had somehow cost him this long brotherhood.

Or suppose that, by good fortune, Daran had not told the story and that Stephen was returning wholly on account of business. What reason could she give him why she could not see Peale again? And how could they be together in C.I.C. and not meet constantly? Or what effect would it have on Stephen's career if his colleagues knew there had been some break between him and his closest friend?

"What is this business trouble which you think is not bringing him back? May it not be that?" she asked.

"I did something rather impulsive and unwise in Caracas, something I shouldn't have done, but it's impossible to suppose Stephen would return because of it and bring it into the light, with God knows what consequences to me before I can put it right. We're too close for him to do that to me."

"He might say he knew you too well to believe you have done whatever you have or that you could have talked to Daran as you have. What you have done is either to lie or steal, isn't it?"

He winced as she said it and a look of such utter despair came over his face that even then she almost pitied him.

The telephone rang and she picked it up automatically. Peale could hear Thomas Johnson's voice on the wire.

"Mrs. Lowry, I'm downstairs, having just had a call from Alec Channing about the house. I wanted to see what we can do to help before Stephen gets here. May I come up for a moment?"

"Of course," she said. "Jim Peale's here also."

"Tom Johnson?" Peale asked in a matter-of-fact tone, and got to his feet as though nothing had happened. "I'll let him in."

She watched in amazement. Then, hearing their voices, friendly and easy, at the door, she had the feeling that she must have misunderstood all that had happened, or that it hadn't happened at all. She looked in a mirror, almost startled that there was no visible change even in her. She turned the picture face down and in what felt like someone else's voice said, as they came in, "Wouldn't you like a drink? A Tom Collins?"

"Well, yes," Johnson replied.

"I'll get it," Peale said, and went out to the kitchen.

"Alec said you were really pleased about the house and I thought our legal department could handle the title search and all that. If you like, we'll have our service department round up painters and electricians or anything else you want."

"If you can do those other things, it will be wonderful."

"Edward wanted me to say he'd send over his gardener to meet you there whenever it's convenient. He'd like doing it; so don't hesitate to say yes."

Peale came in with the frosty glasses and they all cheerily drank to the new home.

"You're all too good to us. How can we repay this sort of thing?" she asked.

"Friends are supposed to help friends," Peale said, lighting a cigarette. From his easy manner toward her and Johnson, one would have supposed he was what he was believed to be—affluent, successful, at peace with himself and those around him.

"You haven't heard why Stephen's coming back, have you?" Johnson asked. "I hope he hasn't picked up some bug."

"No, I haven't heard," Rosalie replied, "but he thrives in any climate, on any diet, particularly in Paris."

"Probably got homesick," Peale said.

"And who can blame him?" Johnson said with a smile at Rosalie. "Jim, you have no idea what this Morval Project he cabled about is, have you?"

"Not the slightest."

"When do the children arrive, Mrs. Lowry?" Johnson asked.

"On the Queen, Wednesday of week after next."

"Alec says you gave him a check to bind the bargain until 'when, as and if' the title's clear. I'll have them push the search and get in touch with you."

Johnson finished his drink, declined another and said he must be off.

"So must I," Peale told him.

"If my wife were out of town," Johnson said with a laugh, "I'd take the lady to dinner. What's the matter with you young men?"

"I've already been turned down," Peale replied. "Sure you won't change your mind?"

"Quite sure. I have too much to think about."

Johnson put his hand on Peale's shoulder. "Tough luck. Good-by. Now call one of us whatever you want. James, my boy, I'll give you a lift uptown."

As she drew her hand back from Johnson's she had the feeling that she must tell them both to wait, implore Peale to tell this pleasant older comrade he had done something that he wanted to put right, that if she could only do that, Johnson, hearing it, would say, "Well, this isn't so very bad. I think we can fix it up. I'm glad you told me." She looked at Peale, almost willing him to speak, feeling like saying, "I'll go in the other room while you tell Mr. Johnson."

But as Johnson turned to go, Peale picked up the picture she had left face down by the telephone, put it in his side pocket and followed Johnson to the door.

A SHORT TRIP TO TOWN

I told Perly I'd wait in the car. He stuck a penny in the parking meter and walked away.

I don't mean he just dropped a penny in the slot, the trick is to slide the penny in so it's out of sight, but not far enough to start the machinery. Then if a cop comes along you tell him the meter is stuck and he'll commence to pound and kick at it and the penny will shake loose and the arrow will come up to twelve minutes. Of course when that happens you lose your penny, but like Perly says, that's the breaks of the game.

I got out and wandered down to the store Elvira works in. The Bon Ton Ala Mode they call it. They figure all those Latin words give it class and keep out the riffraff—so Perly says. I looked in the window to see if I could locate Elvira. All I could see was a couple of wooden ladies in the window—the kind they put dresses on and night shirts and the like. Well, one of them had on a dress, but not the other. Not a stitch. It didn't seem right somehow.

"You look kind of sunburned." I turned around and there was Elvira standing in back of me. "Either that," she said, "or you're part Indian."

"Seems to me you could cover up those ladies when they haven't got any clothes on," I said. "You know there's young folks walking along the street."

"Old folks too," she said. "What are you and Pop up to?"

"Just visiting," I said, "running some errands and what not." I headed back to the car.

She followed me as far as the curb and stopped there. She was looking at the car with a kind of sour expression. Well, it didn't look so hot at that. Coming through that plowed field had been Perly's idea, but he kept insisting there used to be a road there. And quite a bit of mud had splashed up from where the back fender was supposed to be.

"Your pa wanted to try out a short cut," I said.

"I thought maybe he was trying to stucco it," she said. "Listen now, if the two of you have any notion of starting trouble between Albert and me, you'd better get it out of your head."

"If you think I'm going to waste my time," I told her, "on some woman that's fool enough to pass up a fine-looking fellow that owns close to four hundred acres clear and a blue-tick hound and can play the Spanish guitar ——" I said to her. "Anyways, I don't know what you're talking about."

I suppose she might of been thinking of the last time I and Perly came to town. He went into the bank and got change for a quarter or something, and then when the foreman or whatever they call the head man was passing by, why Perly says in a loud voice, "I hope you got plenty of ten spots in the till there, Albert, we'll need them at the poker game tonight. Last time you run out of them and had to go back for more." Well, there was some remarks and some confusion and it ended up with Perly getting the heave-ho, but he isn't the kind that gives up easy, and I didn't doubt that he had something worked out for this time.

"Just remember I'm not going to stand for any foolishness," Elvira said. "If you and Pop aren't out of here within an hour I'm going to have a cop come around and check that parking meter you've doctored up."

Well, I don't have to take that kind of talk from any redheaded girl. I got in the car and slammed the door, and pretty soon she walked away. Like Perly said, what she needed was to have someone take a stick to her and that's exactly what I would of done had I been ten years younger and her too.

A small girl poked her head out of the car next door. "My name's Janie," she said. She was sucking on the front window like a piece of ice. "I've got a doll named Arabella and Sister Sue and Veronica. I've got a lot more, but those three are best."

That was fine. If Veronica wanted to marry a banker —— I mean Elvira. If she wanted to get married —— "What do you kids want?" I said. There was another one sticking his head out the back window.

"Do you know Mr. Wiffrow," he said, "that lives at the end of our street? He's awful old. He's going to die pretty soon."

"Ronald, he is not." Janie reached back her elbow and raked him alongside the neck.

"When Mr. Wiffrow dies," Ronald said, "I'm going to get his vacuum cleaner and play in his house."

That seemed fair enough. The point was this Albert was a big fellow—make two of Anse, or one and a half, but he ran more to suet than to beef. And Elvira was a high-stepping girl. I couldn't see her serving tea to a pack of fat ladies every afternoon and talking about some flute player. That's what bankers' wives have to do. So Perly says.

"Once when I was real little I went on a boat," Janie said. "That was before Ronald was even born."

"That was before I was even born," Ronald said, "that was when I was in my mother's tummy."

I don't know who tells city kids all these things, but whoever it is I wish they'd stop.

"Sure," Ronald said, "didn't you know that?"

"You kids hush up," I said.

"Well, really." Their mamma had come up between the cars. She got in and slammed the door and gave me a mean look. "I guess even children have some right to express themselves."

She seemed kind of put out so I tried to smooth things over. "That's right," I said. "You go ahead, Janie—tell me what your daddy was saying that time you hid in the closet when he thought you were in bed ——"

"You kids hush up," the lady said. "I've a good notion to call the police," and she drove away.

But that's how it goes. You get an interesting conversation started and somebody will change the subject. I had been keeping an eye on the bank all the while so I spotted Albert when he came out, walking flat-footed and rubbery and looking important. Going to lunch, I presumed. He stopped in front of the dress store, waiting for Elvira, no doubt. Standing along back of him was this woman—the kind they call a vamp. She had on a floppy hat and her face all painted and she was keeping an eye on Albert. I thought I'd get out and stretch my legs a little.

Pretty quick Elvira comes out of the store and Albert goes up and takes her by the arm. And the other woman steps up and takes him by the arm. "Why, Albert," she says, "I'm sorry I couldn't make it last night. Why don't you drop over tonight?"

Albert's eyes were sort of bugged out. "What did you say?"

"Yes," said Elvira. "Say that again."

The vamp put her hand on his shoulder. "Albert, you're such a tease—and so extravagant. The girls all thought the earrings were beautiful."

"Madam," he said, kind of frozen, "there must be some mistake." He fished in his pocket and dug out a quarter. "Here," he said, "take this and buy yourself some coffee."

"It's too much," she said. "First the earrings and now this ——"

"Take it," Elvira said, "and get moving."

The other lady looked at her and started to laugh. Then she took another look and walked away, moving fast.

"I don't know that it's quite proper," Albert said, "for you to speak to a woman of that nature. It isn't dignified."

"You think it would be more dignified," Elvira said, "to stand here all afternoon and hand her quarters?"

"I had the situation well in hand," he said. "It's a man's job to handle this sort of thing." He puffed out his chest a little, or pulled in his stomach—it was hard to tell.

"All right," Elvira said, "let's have lunch."

I had barely got back to the car when Perly showed up. "How did it work?" he said. "You saw it, didn't you?"

"Felt it too," I told him. "I was just standing behind a lamppost when her and Albert walked by and she snaked out her foot and like to of broke my shin. Seems like I keep forgetting what long legs and poor manners she's got. If I was her father ——"

"It all comes from her mother's side," Perly said; "it wouldn't matter a hoot who her father was. No, it looks like we won't get any place trying to saw off Albert. We've got to build up Anse. Get him to spruce up a little—learn some culture."

"He already knows The Shooting of Dan McGrew," I told him. "And you don't need to worry about clothes either. Do you know what he paid for that hunting coat he just got? Seventy dollars, that's all—sent from Maine, New England. No, when it comes to culture and dressing up, why Anse don't have to take a back seat to anybody."

"That's a fact," Perly said, "and he can sing too. I've heard him do forty-four verses of Frankie and Johnnie and not take a breath. And I happen to know the banker can't sing a note. What do you suppose has got into that girl of mine? What does she want?"

"O.K., what does she want?" Anse had his head poked through the window.

"Seems like you've had chance enough to find out," Perly told him. "If you don't know how to handle her by now I don't see that you ever will."

"You've known her longer than I have." Anse climbed into the back seat. "I can't see that you're able to handle her any better than average."

"Well, that's so," Perly said. "A poor old farmer like me might not cut much ice, but a young fellow that can afford a imported coat from Maine and a blue-tick hound ——"

"There's as good a dog as you'll ever see," Anse said. "I've got a standing offer of fifty dollars for every one of her pups and I don't doubt I can do better."

"You've got to do better than that to interest Elvira," Perly said. "That banker has got a phonograph that plays three speeds. I don't know what they are—neutral, low and reverse I suppose—but that's the kind of competition you're up against."

Anse nodded. "I been studying some magazines," he said—"they tell you all about the things that women go for. Like how to make a table out of an old buggy wheel and grow a flower garden in the kitchen and such as that. Or you take the bathroom—the big things there are a tile floor and a sunken tub. So that's where I decided to start. I got hold of some old pieces of marble from the monument works and fixed the floor up pretty good. Then I sunk the tub—couldn't see much logic to it, but that's what women like, so there you are."

"Seems like any woman in her right mind would appreciate that," Perly said.

"Of course it does hang down through the parlor ceiling," Anse said, "but I don't see that makes any difference."

"No difference at all," said Perly. "It isn't as if you could see through it."

"I thought I might knock the feet off it," Anse said, "they don't serve much purpose, and maybe paper over it, but I don't know." He sat there thinking for a spell. "Maybe I'm barking up the wrong tree."

"That's a good point," Perly said. "A girl like Elvira—what she needs is a fellow with some action to him. Like that poem I read one time—Young Lord Lochinvar, his steed was the best? Anyhow he rides up to this dance hall and throws this girl over his saddle and rides away. I was wondering how somethin like that might work out."

"I don't know," Anse said. "Elvira is a awful lot of girl to throw over a saddle, esp cially if she didn't happen to have her min set on it. Anyhow, I haven't got a horse."

"There's nothing in the world any easier t get hold of," Perly said. "You can ride on can't you?"

"I don't know," Anse said. "All the exper ence I ever had was driving a team for m uncle. They were hitched to a stoneboat."

Perly thought that over. "No," he said f nally, "I don't know that we've got the rig answer yet."

Anse looked a little bit let down. "Well," h said, "women are fond of flowers, so they te me. I thought I'd get some sunflower seed and try that." He got out of the car.

"It won't hurt to try," Perly said. "Ho many you going to put in?"

"I thought about an acre to start with," h said. "If it turns out she really likes them I ca plant more." He walked away.

Perly shook his head. "Now I'll tell you," he said, "that girl of mine just isn't natural she don't take to a fellow like that." He g out and slammed the door. I did the same.

A contrary woman like Elvira, she don give a rap how many people she makes mise able—just so she gets her own way. I walke up and down the block a couple of times. Th second time I met Elvira coming out of th bank.

"I've only got one thing to say to you," sh said—"get out of town."

"I just wanted to talk to you," I said, "li a father."

"I've already got one father too many," s said, "starting from the time he turned th peroxide siren on poor Albert."

I hadn't heard any siren that Perly turn on, but it sure sounded like his style. "I your happiness I've got in mind," I told he "and if you want to be bullheaded and mar some lard bucket ——"

"Listen," she said, "I know all about th pheasant and the bass, and they'll still b there, and Anse will still be your pal no matt who I marry." She gave a jerk of her head an started on down the street.

"That's fine and dandy," I told her, "s long as Anse's wife feels the same."

She stopped and turned around real slo "What wife is that?"

"I don't know what wife," I said; "wha ever one he's got picked out, I suppose. H sure isn't putting in that fancy bathroom f himself and the dogs, nor planting all of the flowers and the like."

"All right," she said, "I'm listening. Wh bathroom?"

"The one with the marble floor Anse is pu ting in," I said, "and the sunken tub and don't know what all. Nothing but the best right down the line."

"Well, fine," she said, "a new bathroom. When he was going with me he wouldn't even buy a new necktie."

"He had a new one. You remember, the green one? Used to wear it all the time."

"I know," she said, "I remember. I'd like to tie it around his neck this very minute." She turned away and clipped on down the street and into her store. There's those that say women are easy to understand, but I've never seen anybody yet that could prove it. I went back and got in the car.

Maybe everything would work out all right anyhow, I thought, and come right down to it, there was all the rabbits I could ever use right out in my own back lot. Of course for pheasant and quail there was nothing like Anse's place. And it did look to me like Elvira might be better off with some man that would stand up to her and not some loose-change sorter. But then you look at it another way, there's a lot more work to plucking a pheasant than skinning a rabbit, and once you get it stewed up with some onions and potatoes I don't know that there's too much difference. On the other hand I didn't know when I'd ever get another chance to run a blue-tick hound, and it did seem like Anse needed a woman to look after him even if it was Elvira. That's how it goes—you try to figure all the angles and when you end up you don't know where you are at.

"Where's Perly?" I looked up and there was Anse opening the back door. "My car's way over the other side of town and I didn't feel like carrying this." He heaved something in the back seat that rocked the car. "Seventy pounds of sunflower seeds," he said, "that's all they had. And ten pounds of delphinium. I thought I'd plant them around the borders. You think she might like that?"

"She couldn't help it," I told him.

"That's how I had it figured." He looked up the street and down the street and rubbed his nose. "What do they look like," he said, "delphiniums?"

"I never saw any myself. But women go crazy for them. You can count on that."

"Believe I'll get a few tulip seeds," he said. "Sort of sprinkle them around here and there. Can't do any harm."

"Might do a lot of good," I said. It seemed to me it was the wrong time of year to plant tulip seeds, but I let him go.

I noticed a fat lady get into the car next door. She took some candy out of a paper sack and started feeding it to a little bug-eyed dog she had.

"They tell me it's bad for a dog to have somebody feed it candy," I told her.

"Tell me," said a philosopher, "where is God?" "First tell me," said the other, "where He is not."

ANON.

"Oh, hello." She looked around kind of vague. "Say, when are you coming out to fix my hot-water heater?"

"I haven't given it any thought," I told her.

"Every time I turn on a faucet I get steam," she said, "and I've got the dial turned down as far as it will go."

"More than likely the dial is on backwards," I said. "Your best bet is to turn it up as far as it will go."

That didn't seem to satisfy her. "It's been making awful noises," she said. "If I turn it up, aren't you afraid it will explode?"

"That don't worry me a bit," I told her.

"Well, all right," she said, "if you say so." She backed out and drove away.

I learned that from Perly. Any time some stranger asks you something and you don't know the answer, why tell them something anyhow. It makes the road of life just a little easier, Perly says, if a person thinks somebody is taking an interest in his problems.

Now there was another woman standing in front of the car. First off I thought she was talking to me, but it turned out she was hollering to some friend across the street. "What's Howard wearing to the dance?" she wanted to know. "I told Graham it was formal and he said if he was the only one there in a Tux he'd make me walk home."

Her friend across the street shook her head. "What did you say?"

Well, the lady on my side told her all right. "What's Howard wearing to the dance?" she said. "I told Graham it was formal and he said if he was the only one there in a Tux he'd make me walk home."

The lady across the street still didn't get it. She put her hand back of her ear and pointed to the traffic. "I can't hear you," she said. The one on my side took a deep breath. She was all set to tell about Graham for the third time. I noticed fellows all along the street were commencing to exchange glances. They were about ready to get up a posse and go out and teach Graham a little more respect for womenfolks. I concluded it was time somebody took a hand.

I stuck my head out the window and called to the lady across the street, "Holy smokes, what is Graham wearing to the dance? I mean Howard. What are you and Howard going to wear?" Well, there was so many things to keep straight I had got it mixed up and spoiled the effect. Besides that, some great big fellow come up and took hold of her arm. I judged that was Howard. It seemed like I'd done all I could to straighten out the situation, so I pulled my head back inside and started looking under the dashboard for loose wires. When I looked up I could see Howard in the mirror. He was waving his arms and pointing, and his wife had him by the elbow coaxing him along. I couldn't see Graham's wife and I didn't care. They could work out their own problems for all of me. Just about then somebody opened the door.

It was Albert. "You've been parked here for upwards of two hours," he said. "I pushed your penny into the parking meter—the one you caused to be stuck. I presume you know there is a law against tampering with coin-operated machines."

"Presume all you want to," I told him. "An while you're at it you can presume it's agains the law to fool around with other people' pennies."

"I considered that. Any coin or coins in serted in a parking meter become the prop erty of the city, and it is the duty of a goo citizen ——"

"Oh, banana oil," I told him. "You mus of gone to the courthouse to look that up Good thing I didn't put in a nickel, you'd c gone to the state capitol."

"These parking spaces are customarily use by our depositors," he said. "If you aren gone from here in ten minutes ——" He go out of the car.

I waited to hear what he was going to do but when I looked over at him he wasn there. He was standing on the sidewalk wit his feet just barely touching, and this great bi fellow had him by the shirt front. It wa Howard.

"Mr. Reevely, our president, isn't likely t be pleased," Albert said, "having a disturb ance outside the bank." He was swinging h legs trying to locate the sidewalk.

"I don't like fat strangers making remark to my wife," said Howard.

"You put him down this instant." Howar looked around and there was Elvira pushin through the crowd. "Albert doesn't make re marks to strange women, or any women," sh said, "or do anything else."

"Let's make sure of it," Howard said, an he drew back his fist. He never did get t throw a punch, because Elvira had got hold his arm with both hands. "Why don't yo keep out of this?" Howard said to her. H jerked his arm back and forth to get rid her. "A woman's place is in the home, didn anybody ever tell you that? And not in son street brawl." It was a nice speech, but all proved to me was that he didn't know Elvir

"You started it," she said, "and if it's brawl you want, you've come to the righ street." She stamped on his foot a couple times.

"I hope Mr. Reevely isn't watching," Albert said. "It disturbs him to see a lady who isn't ladylike."

"Who asked you?" Howard said. "You keep out of this."

I never did see a fight before where everybody in it wanted everybody else to keep out of it. I commenced looking around for Perly's monkey wrench. It turned out I didn't need it. Anse came out of the hardware store with a pair of tree trimmers over his shoulder.

"What was it you had in mind?" he said to Howard.

"You keep out of this," Howard said. I had a good notion that was what he'd say. "Go play with your marbles, sonny—if I had a free hand I'd take care of you too."

Anse flipped the trimmers off his shoulder and down across Howard's wrist. Howard let go of Albert and he stumbled back and came up against a lamppost.

"Well, there's your free hand," Anse said.

"Might as well have two free ones," Elvira said, and she let go the other wrist. "I hope he knocks some sense into you." She was either talking to Anse or Howard, but I couldn't tell which.

"I won't forget this disgraceful exhibition," Albert said, "you can be sure of that," and he flat-footed it back to the bank. I judged he was talking to Howard, but it could have been Elvira or Anse. Or even me. It seems like people don't talk as plain as they used to.

Howard was rubbing his wrist, first one, and then he rubbed the other, the one Elvira had bit.

"You drop that thing," he said, "and we'll find out who's the real man around here."

Anse just stood there grinning with the trimmers over his shoulder. It looked like he didn't see any special point in trying to prove who was the real man.

Howard hunched up his shoulders a couple of times and rubbed his fists along his coat, and then he sloped off up the street.

"I suppose you're satisfied," Elvira said.

"I wouldn't say so," Anse said.

"No, naturally not. You wouldn't be happy without your lady friend around to cheer you on."

"What lady friend was that?"

"The one you're remodeling your whole house for," she said, "that's what one. And landscaping and planting flowers for and putting in a sunken tub and I don't know what all. You might as well go ahead and tell me what she's like—I know you can't wait."

"Oh, that one," Anse said. "Well, I can tell you what she's like. She's not exactly beautiful but if she was to ride down the street on an ostrich all the fellows would turn around to look. And the only ones that noticed the ostrich would be over seventy and in poor health. Of course she's got some other characteristics like being stuck up and adder-tongued and got to have her own way."

"That's a lie and you know it," Elvira said. "I'm not any of those last things you said. Anyhow, I was asking about your other girl."

Anse didn't say anything, only looked at her, kind of grinning.

"You needn't act so pleased either," she said, "or think I'm interested in any person that wears boots even in the city."

Anse didn't look up or down—just shucked off his boots and handed them to a kind of ragged-looking farm boy that was standing around. "Here, son," he said, "wear them until you run into some headstrong female"—a pair of calfskin boots that cost him $32 not six weeks before. They would of fit me too.

"That was real smart," Elvira said. "You look like a real philanthropist, standing there with all your toes sticking out of your socks."

"Why, I've got a whole lot of new socks," Anse said, "I just haven't got around to taking the price tags off."

"Well, take those off," she said. "Better that people think you're crazy than know you're plain shiftless."

"What do you care what people think about me?" he said.

"I don't care," she said. "You can crawl into your sunken tub and pull the ground over you—I won't miss you ——" She seemed real worked up about it. And then the two of them seemed to get further and further away.

Perly had got in the car and backed it out from the curb and I hadn't even noticed. "Don't you want to see how it comes out?" I asked him.

"No," he said. He wouldn't even talk about it. All he would do was sing under his breath and hum—mostly hymns and patriotic songs. I happened to mention Anse and Elvira a few times as we drove along, but he didn't say anything. Finally he pulled the car off the road and stopped. We were right at the north edge of Anse's place. The land there was grown up with sumac and blackberries and thorn apples and the like.

"I recall stopping here ten, twelve years ago," Perly said. "That was when Anse's father was living."

"Ten–twelve years; that sounds about right."

"You know what he was like—muleheaded. He was bound and determined he was going to get a crop out of that field. I must of stood here half a day watching him try to plow it and cussing every rock and gully. It was as good as a show."

"Broke his neck, didn't he?"

"That was later. I just happened to be watching. He was running a binder and a wheel caught that stump over there—must of throwed him fifteen feet. I shot a pheasant last year not half a step from where he lit."

"Seems like there's more there every year," I said.

"Anse has got good sense, Perly said. "He knows where to plow and where to let nature take over. I and him worked it out one time and we figured a fellow will do best if he lets nature take over about ninety-two per cent of the job. We didn't have any pencil or paper, but that seemed about right."

"Seems too bad about Anse," I said, "him and Elvira, that is."

Perly chuckled. "She sure was handing him everything but peace and quiet," he said. "I could of closed my eyes and swore it was her mother carrying on, back when we were courting." He started up the engine and shifted into low. "Well, leave it to nature. As long as you do your eight per cent or thereabouts you're all right, and I figure we've done that and some over." He looked out across the fields. "That's a fine piece of land there," he said. "Any man that's got a daughter that marries the fellow that owns that place ——" He turned off the engine. "You know I saw the biggest fox squirrel back in that oak grove I ever saw in my life."

"You don't want to forget the quail," I said, "and the coon."

"I wouldn't forget," he said. "I'm not that kind." He started up the engine again. "A man gets to be my age and he commences to think maybe there's times when he's done the wrong thing. And times when he hasn't."

"There's others besides you in the same boat," I told him.

"A man wants to have something for folks to remember him by." He was looking off over the fields to the hills. "He likes to feel his name will go on after he's gone."

I knew what he meant. Many's the time we'd hunted there and we'd be there again this season and next year too. But sooner or later there would be a time when hunting season would open and Perly and I neither one would show up. He didn't say it, but I could tell that's what he had in mind.

"Cheer up," I told him. "What with Anse and Elvira and one thing another it wouldn't surprise me if there was a young Perly running across the fields one of these days."

He seemed to brighten up considerable. "I don't know that it's my place," he said, "but when the time comes you might mention it kind of tactful. Just suggest that if the bluetick ever has a litter—maybe they could call one of them 'Perly.'" END

A certain supposition about spring
Led us to this. It came from winds that blew
More softly over rooftops, pushing clouds
Of warm mist through the town, and brought something
To each of us; it fetched our paths through
The aimless streets, and it draped these green shrouds
Over heaps of splintered rubbish of glass, of ash,
Of burned-out tin cans littered in the park.
We can only guess what it was. Perhaps Subtle volumes in the rain will say, or flash
Of lightning show its pattern in a stark
Image. But spring has powers to lead past traps
We know, those broken winters of the heart,
To this sunlit meeting, our sunlit start.

Should your child be a Librarian?

Special Libraries, privately maintained to serve specific professions or industries such as law, electronics, insurance and the like, offer increasing opportunities to skilled librarians who are themselves primarily interested in these specialized fields.

by EDWARD G. FREEHAFER

Director, The New York Public Library
(As told to LLEWELLYN MILLER)

"WHY DIDN'T I think of that!" teased a college classmate in mock envy when I told him I had decided to become a librarian. "What a soft life—go to work, stamp a few cards, spend the rest of the day reading in your ivory tower!"

He was only half joking.

His impression of my chosen work was what he had seen in casual visits to look up a fact or borrow a book. To him, "librarian" meant the attendant behind the desk of a hushed reading room.

Like so many otherwise well-informed people of today, he had only the vaguest idea of the enormously varied duties, opportunities and rewards that my profession offers.

There is good reason.

There have been custodians of the written and printed word since man began to record his knowledge, but librarianship as a modern profession is relatively quite new and has grown very fast to keep pace with the phenomenal expansion of our libraries.

The first library in the United States was established in 1638 when John Harvard bequeathed 400 books to the university that bears his name. Today, Harvard's library contains some 6,000,000 volumes.

The first circulating library in this country was organized in 1731, in Philadelphia. It was more a club than a library, since its use was restricted to its subscribers. As for a librarian—there wasn't one unless you count the member who volunteered to keep a list of borrowers, without pay. His name was Benjamin Franklin.

Not until 1833—only 124 years ago—was our first tax-supported, free, circulating public library opened. Little Peterborough, N. H., made that important big stride.

The idea flashed throughout our land. Free libraries, supported all or in part by public funds, came into being with almost explosive rapidity.

Today, we have nearly 7,000 publicly owned libraries, not counting their 3,100 branches. These vary in size from The New York Public Library with its 80 miles of shelves in the Central Building alone, and staff of over 2,000, to county libraries that serve readers in isolated communities by bookmobile.

In addition, we have over 20,000 libraries in elementary and high schools. There are vast collections in our colleges and universities. The Library of Congress, our national library and biggest in the country, has 10,000,000 volumes, plus millions of non-book items.

In 1947, there were 1,600 Special Libraries, for the most part supported by and serving business and industry. Today, we have more than 3,000.

There is great competition among all of these for trained librarians.

Not too long ago, a high school graduate could start as a page and eventually become a librarian, learning as he worked, usually for quite low wages.

That is no longer the case.

As libraries grew, so did the need for qualified staffs to run them. Today, the title "trained librarian" ordinarily means one who has completed the five years of study at college or university level leading to a Master's degree.

Salaries have kept pace with increased educational requirements, but the demand for librarians far exceeds the supply. At one library school, twelve different positions were open to each member of the 1956 class!

What does a librarian do?

Having a job in a library is different from being a librarian. At least half of the staff of a big library has training in other fields. These are the clerical workers, the business machine operators, microfilm technicians, building maintenance workers, bookbinders and scores of other specialists. As a general thing, you do not find the graduate librarian behind a charging desk.

Briefly described, the librarian's work is the selection, acquisition, organization of and—especially important—guidance to man's recorded knowledge whether for research, study, self-improvement, business or recreation.

Think what this means and what a wide choice is open to the qualified boy or girl!

Acquisition · Has your child a thirst for knowledge and an inquiring mind? The selecting and purchasing of new as well as old books, periodicals, government documents, music and other materials is a fascinating part of library operation.

Organization · Has your child executive talent? The library needs directors, administrators and supervisors to see that the river of books flows smoothly into the hands of readers. The organization of reference material and giving aid in its use are absorbing duties in which young people with some one special interest can find great rewards.

"Science is my hobby, but I don't want to be an engineer or technician," said a young man who came to me for career advice. "Is there any way I can concentrate on the sciences in library work?"

He could and did. He is now the head of a big technical library, building a sound career and making a valuable contribution in the field of his keenest interest.

A librarian serving at an information desk, such as this one in the New York Public Library, must know exactly where to look to find the answers to questions on almost every subject under the sun. Many have learned to speak several languages to help them in answering inquiries.

Many of us are appreciators of the arts and sciences without having the desire or the temperament to be creators or performers in them.

Over and over we hear, "I'm interested in law—but I don't want to practice it;" "I love music—but I'm not a composer or musician;" "Economics absorbs me—but I don't want to go into business;" "History is my hobby—but I don't want to teach it."

These are the bright young people who may find greatest satisfaction in a library career. There are few special interests from Art to Zoology which cannot be turned to account in a library.

Guidance · Today's library is no ivory tower, though sometimes the studious lone wolf can find his cave in it, too. It is a busy community center where people of many different talents work together for the benefit of every element of society. One of the librarian's most important and interesting tasks is providing guidance to the vast store of riches, available to all through books—if they know where to look.

Here come the children for a story-telling session, a picture book hour, perhaps a puppet show. Here come the parents for discussion groups, exhibits, lectures and concerts as well as books. Here is a commercial artist in search of prints of ancient steam engines. Here is a businessman asking for census figures. There is a writer wanting help with research for a historical novel: a scientist checking facts; a sociologist working on a report; doctors, lawyers, merchants, chiefs, club women, housewives, professors and pupils—there is nothing isolated or routine about a librarian's life.

If your child likes the bustle of a big city, a large public library may be his goal. If he likes to be an active part of a neighborhood, branch libraries of big systems or libraries in small towns will put him in close touch with his fellow citizens. If he likes the academic atmosphere, there are challenging careers waiting in school, college and university libraries.

Special Libraries deserve special mention. These are collections, often very large and usually privately maintained to serve a company, industry, profession or association. Most often they pertain to one subject—law, medicine, genealogy, natural history, art, electronics, merchandising, drama, transportation, banking, military affairs, religion, insurance, advertising—the list is long. Their librarians are specialists whose professional work frequently includes creative compiling of reports, or other aids to members of these various occupations.

What training is required?

Basic career requirement is four years in college leading to a Bachelor's degree, followed by one year at one of the 35 accredited Library Schools for a Master's degree in Library Science. A Liberal Arts course is a good background. Credits in languages, literature, economics and the physical and social sciences are valuable.

Some state universities have Library Schools, so the cost of tuition can be as little as $400 a year. Some scholarships are available, and many major libraries have training programs which permit students to gain experience while paying their way through Library School.

What does a librarian earn?

The library is not the place for those mainly interested in making a fortune, though salaries are at a level for which we need no longer apologize. They compare favorably with those in other professions allied with teaching and social service.

Library School graduates, without experience, averaged from $3,900 to $4,200 in 1956 in different parts of the country. Chief librarians in major cities receive as much as $17,000—more in some cases. At present, a number of top federal government positions pay up to $14,800. Salaries in libraries maintained by industry occasionally go as high as $25,000.

Most library systems have retirement plans. Many publicly supported libraries provide the benefits of Civil Service.

Both men and women can aspire to jobs at the top of our profession. The head of one of our largest systems, The Chicago Public Library, is a woman.

How can you tell if your child is suited for a library career?

The chances are that your child, if he is a good student and is above average mentally and has a respect for knowledge, will make a good librarian. Scientific studies have revealed the not so startling fact that librarians are normal human beings. If you take a cross-section of the profession you will find the whole range of personalities. The diversity of work in the various phases of librarianship is one of the great attractions of the field.

If your child has leadership ability, he will find there is unusual need for his talent in supervisory and administrative departments. If your child has a scholarly bent and a liking for people, he is ideally suited for public service work. Even if he is not gregarious, there are many places where just plain intellectual curiosity is the most needed trait.

One good way to find out if your child can be happy and successful in a libary career is to urge him to sample it. This is not hard to do. Young people often can find jobs as pages or junior clerks during the summer or after school, or as junior assistants in college libraries. By seeing our work from the inside, the youngsters who are suited for the library may realize, even though their work is limited to clerical tasks, that they have found the place that will keep them endlessly challenged and interested.

The library has high standards. It deserves and demands the best, but in return it gives rewards beyond any counting in money. It offers a position of influence and dignity in the community; a title of which anyone can be proud; and the knowledge that each day's work is a valuable contribution of education, amusement, solace or inspiration to others.

Silky cotton satin makes Carol's party dress. A young touch: each button in a different color. Vogue Design 1576. 10 to 16.

Carol's navy jacket with a hood (made from a gym shirt) is banded with a silver-and-blue braid.

Teen-age fashions for Sun and fun

By NORA O'LEARY

Pattern Editor of the Journal

Teen-agers like Kathy and Carol Dennerlein not only follow fashions, but set them. Take, for instance, their colorful jumpers with the gay printed blouses. Both parts do double duty. The blouse combines with matching shorts for tennis. The jumper without the blouse becomes a sun dress for a warm California day. Kathy favors separates to mix and match. Her red dirndl pussycat print is very easy to make and she wears it with a white peasant blouse or with a white sweater. Carol favors one-piece dresses. Her mauve cotton satin is a perfect party dress, and her red print is just right for school. Their braid-trimmed jackets are regular gym shirts minus the ribbing at the waistline and sleeves. Both Kathy and Carol love the individuality and the fit of the clothes their mother makes for them, and both are new but eager sewers themselves.

LEOMBRUNO-BODI

Kathy's amusing canvas skirt with the calico dolls comes complete in a package for $5.95. The skirt is partially assembled and stamped for the placing of appliqués which are included. Write and we'll tell you where to buy. Her blouse, matching a doll, is Vogue Design No. 1565. 10 to 16.

Wide white rickrack trims this gay red, white and black print shirtwaist dress with a perky tie neckline; short sleeves, full skirt. Vogue Design No. 1574. 10 to 16.

before the old people and leaving the doors open behind her.

"It's soon enough for me. My appetite's poor," said Mary's mother. She sat down at the table, sniffing the food daintily with a slight supercilious lifting of her upper lip.

Mary moved restlessly. She felt as if she might fly out the window from pure nervousness.

Her mother said, "Mary, I wish you'd boil me an egg. I can't eat this fish tonight. It'll give me heartburn."

Mary got up and dropped an egg into the kettle of boiling water. She thought, What'll they ever do without me? How'll they ever get used to my not being here? She returned to her seat to wait for the egg to cook.

Her father was eating the fish greedily, taking big mouthfuls and chewing noisily.

Mary warned, "Don't swallow a bone, papa. You know what happened the last time we had perch."

"Lemme alone," he said rudely. "Can't you let me enjoy my vittles?"

"Billy," admonished his wife, "I wish you wouldn't say common words like 'vittles.' Say 'food.'" She turned to Mary. "Don't you reckon my egg's done? I don't want it hard-boiled."

Mary jumped up guiltily and dipped into the kettle for the egg. "I'm sorry, mamma; it's hard," she said, offering the egg in a cup. "But you can cut it up over your greens."

Her mother shook her head obstinately. "I'll eat the fish," she said with the air of one going to the stake. "What made you forget the egg? Why didn't you stand by the stove and count?"

Mary thought, I can't eat, and they'll suspect something's the matter.

But the two old people were so occupied with their own food that they took no notice of Mary's untouched plate. They finished, and Mary set about scraping plates and washing the dishes. When she went into the living room her mother sat near the lamp knitting, and her father was fiddling with the radio dial.

Her mother said, "Hold this yarn for me, Mary."

Mary obediently held out her hands for the wool and sat looking at the older woman as she wound off the stuff in a ball. She's not really cross and hard to please, Mary thought, fixing her gaze on the thin crumpled face opposite. She's spoiled, as Jim says, and so is papa. She watched the alert little figure bending slightly from side to side with the exigencies of the winding. She's only seventy and not a frail old lady; she's strong, decided Mary. But she's so particular. I don't know what she'll do when she knows I've hired a colored woman to come every day to help her after I'm gone. Mary sighed deeply.

Her mother looked up inquiringly. "You tired?" she asked. "How was school today?"

Mary compressed her lips to still their trembling. The small solicitous note in her mother's voice pierced her heart. She said, "No, I'm not tired, but I do get fed up with teaching." I'll try to prepare her, she thought.

"Fed up! You ought to be glad you got a job at your age," her mother replied with asperity. "You ain't forgot you're going on fifty, have you?"

Mary flushed. "No," she said faintly, "I haven't forgotten my age—nor the fact that life is passing me by."

The old lady looked at her shrewdly. "I guess you wish you'd married some no-'count man," she said.

Mary's lips quivered, but not from hurt. She was on the very edge of confessing to her mother what she was planning to do.

Then the old lady said surprisingly, "Ain't that new principal at your school about your age?"

Mary's heart fluttered with apprehension. She hadn't the courage to tell, after all. Could her mother suspect something? Could she have heard anything? Mary replied carefully, "I imagine Mr. Matthews is approaching fifty."

"Widower, ain't he?" she persisted.

Mary rested her elbows on the arms of the chair. Her hands were beginning to flutter. She said, "Yes, his wife lived only a year."

"Well, he won't stay single much longer now he's in the schoolteaching business. Some little snippit'll grab him up."

Before she could bite back the words, Mary said, "I don't think he's the kind to be grabbed up by some silly girl."

"Yes, he is too," her mother said perversely. "His name's Matthews. Didn't he come from the lower part of the county? I used to know some Matthewses, and I didn't know no good of 'em."

Mary was silent. She knew it wouldn't do any good to defend Jim Matthews. He was the type that both her mother and father despised. Easygoing, bookish, satisfied with small blessings, gentle and rather slow.

The old lady went on relentlessly: "I got no use for a schoolteaching man. A fine farmer he'll make—in the schoolhouse three fourths of the time."

Mary said to herself, I told Jim this was how it would be if I talked to papa and mamma.

Her mother looked at her sharply. "I heard he liked that yellow-headed first-grade teacher," she said.

Mary smiled a little and replied, "Yes, I think he does."

A little flicker of relief passed over the elder woman's face, and Mary thought, She was suspicious. Then unaccountably she felt sad. This time tomorrow she'll know she was right, she thought.

Her mother wound off the last of the yarn, and Mary looked over at her father. He was sitting rather disconsolately in his chair, having been unable to get his favorite hillbilly music on the radio. The open paper was in his hand, but he wasn't reading. From pure obstinacy he would not wear his glasses, and without them he could not see.

Mary said, "Want me to read the paper to you, papa?"

He held it out to her mutely. For half an hour she read the news, then she put the paper down and got up.

"You ain't going to bed a'ready?" he asked.

"Yes, sir, if you don't want me for anything," she replied, her heart sinking. There were so many things she wanted to do upstairs.

The old man searched around in one of his pockets and produced a button. "Sew this on for me," he said peremptorily.

Mary got a needle and thread and scissors and sewed the button on the frayed coat. The coat smelled of stale tobacco and faintly of the barn lot. Tears swam in Mary's eyes, and she looked yearningly at her father's slumped figure. He was a little older than her mother, a small man, wiry and hard-looking. Mary dropped her eyes to her sewing. She thought, There's really no need for me to feel as I do. He's well and able to look after himself and after mamma, too, if she would let him. She

TREASON WITH REASON

Fed up with clinkers, this morning I snook

This utmost betrayal!—and had him repair it!

handed him the coat, put away the sewing materials, and paused a moment, looking at the old couple and the familiar room. The carpet with its sprawling red roses was faded to a subdued mellowness. She had done the pale yellow walls herself to correspond to the woodwork of sallow ivory. On the high mantel was the old clock with the picture of the green windmill on its front. The tarnished gilt frames on either side of the clock held the pictures of her mother's parents—the mother in a plaid hoop skirt and mittens on her folded hands, the father with high stock and staring, prominent eyes. They had run away to be married, Mary knew. Her grandmother, a young girl of seventeen, had climbed down the honeysuckle vine from the top of the porch and had gone off behind her lover on his horse. In her staid life with her parents, Mary had treasured this romance in her heart.

The old clock ticked with a measured, solemn sound. Mary's mother folded her knitting and yawned delicately behind her hand, the light glinting on her silver-rimmed spectacles and touching her thin, parted hair. Her father bent over, grunting, to untie his shoes.

"I'll do that, papa," murmured Mary, kneeling at his feet.

The old man did not thank her. He got up and stumped out without even saying good night. Mary looked after him sadly. He doesn't even know I'm here; he takes me for granted, she thought; but how will he feel when I'm gone?"

She looked at her mother, who was taking her hair down and plaiting it into a thin pigtail. "Good night, mamma," she said, and her voice broke.

Her mother yawned again. "Wha'd you say?" she asked. "I don't know what makes me so sleepy. Probably won't sleep a wink when I get in the bed."

Mary climbed the steep flight of stairs that led to her room off the little landing. She opened her door, felt for the two steps that went down to her floor, and stood still in the darkness, sensing the atmosphere of the place that she had slept in since she was a little girl of six and had been moved out of her parents' room. She remembered how she had sobbed there all alone and how in the middle of the night she had crept down again in the piercing winter cold and slipped under the cover next to her father's warm back. Feeling her there, he had muttered:

"Can't get along without your ole papa, can you, daughter?"

The warm tears gushed to her eyes and rolled down her cheeks. Why should she be pulled apart between Jim Matthews and all she had ever known and loved? I hadn't even seen him seven months ago, she thought.

Stepping forward, she turned on the little pink-shaded lamp by her bed, then sat down in a low rocker and opened the table drawer. I'll write the note while I'm in the notion, she determined with a sort of reckless abandon. She took out paper and a pencil and wrote rapidly. It took only a few minutes, for she had rehearsed what she wanted to say many times in her heart. She folded the paper, put it in an envelope, and laid it on the table. Quietly, almost stealthily, she went to and fro in the low-ceiled, shadowy room, making her simple preparations for flight. From the closet she dragged a suitcase, laid it on the bed, and proceeded to pack swiftly.

Schoolhouses are the republican line of fortifications.
HORACE MANN

Just enough for two days and nights, she thought breathlessly. Jim and I have to be back at the school Monday morning. I'll be back to get the rest of my things—if papa and mamma will let me. Jim says he doesn't see how they can be so angry or consider themselves deserted. I'll be right down the road at his place and can come any time they need me.

She closed the suitcase and stood petrified. Was there a sound of creaking on the stairs? She turned out the light and stood listening in the darkness. After five minutes of suffocating this new Kotex belt with the self-locking clasp –doesn't "dig in"

as metal clasps do,
yet won't ever break

You'll agree, this new Kotex belt does wonders for your comfort. The unbreakable clasp flexes with the body so it can't "dig in" as metal clasps do. And it holds the napkin firmly and securely, never lets it slip or slide. The specially-woven elastic, too, stays flat and snug. No matter how much you move around, the edges won't curl or twist.

To get your free Kotex belt, send the end tab from any box of Kotex napkins with the coupon below. We will send you a certificate that's as good as cash.

Now's the time to discover new Kotex napkins with Wondersoft covering . . . so gentle it won't rub, won't chafe. And the new Kotex napkin goes with the new Kotex belt perfectly, to complete your comfort.

suspense, she turned the light on again and began to undress. She hurried with her preparations for bed and got in between the cold sheets. Stiff and unrelaxed she lay there. I can't even say my prayers, she thought, almost in a panic. Closing her eyes resolutely, she listened to the soft murmur of her little alarm clock. She had set it for four-thirty. After half an hour, she reached out and turned off the alarm. I don't think they can hear it up here, but they might, and if papa gets up, I'll never get away. She drew a deep breath, and on the end of it fell asleep.

She slept dreamlessly and awoke suddenly, knowing that a sound had aroused her. She sat up in bed half terrified. Maybe I've overslept and papa is already up, she thought. She turned on the light and looked at the clock. It was just four o'clock. Then eerily through the darkness she heard the sound that had awakened her—the querulous call of the old Rhode Island Red rooster in the chinaberry tree by the smokehouse. It was too soon to get up. Mary lay there, thinking of Jim Matthews across the fields in the old farmhouse—"the old Wood place," it had always been called. He had appeared there last fall, and it had been noised around the neighborhood that he had bought it. Then when school started at the big consolidated schoolhouse up the road, it was discovered that the former principal had resigned at the last minute. Calls of distress were sent out, and one day Mary went into the principal's office and found a big sprawling figure in the chair behind the desk.

"You know, I liked you straight off," he told her afterward. "A little Jane Eyre sort of creature. And from the first, I knew I needed you, Miss Mary."

Mary remembered the day she realized he meant to marry her. He had been sitting on top of one of her third-grade desks in her schoolroom. He said in his slow drawl, "That's a lonely old house I live in. It needs a woman."

She sat still at her desk, and slowly, in spite of her unbelief, a tide of pure happiness flooded her whole body. Why, he means me! she thought. But even then she remembered her father and mother. They would never agree to her marrying and leaving them, she knew.

His courting was of the most unobtrusive kind—a look, a word, a line scrawled on a piece of paper—"Come to my office for a moment after school, please. Miss Mary"—brought to her room by a student. He had never said he loved her.

Perhaps he doesn't—not in a romantic way, Mary thought, and sighed. What she felt was that she couldn't give him up, not even for duty's sake. In the end it was she who suggested running away.

"Won't they be terribly shocked?" Jim had asked, meaning her parents. "And isn't that cowardly, Miss Mary?"

"I can't help it." Mary had replied doggedly. "I'd never marry you if I had to argue with them about it first. There are so many reasons they could bring up against it. First, you are a stranger in the neighborhood. They don't know who you are. As for being a schoolteacher and a farmer, they never heard of such a thing. And it hasn't crossed their minds since I was twenty-five that I might marry. They would make me feel I was doing something wicked."

Jim shrugged in his lazy way. "Have it your own way. You know best, I suppose, but it's not cricket, do you think?"

Mary gazed wide-eyed into the darkness, turning on the lamp at intervals to look at the clock. At four-thirty, she rose cautiously and like a thief tiptoed around the room, dressing. She looked out the east window. No sign of the dawn yet, but she must hurry. Her father would be stirring as soon as light showed. What was that? A real creak on the stairs this time. Footsteps stopping at her door and her mother's low voice:

"Mary, you'll have to get up and take your papa to the doctor." She turned the doorknob. "What you got your door locked for?"

Mary hastily threw on her old bathrobe over her clothes and unlocked the door. "What's the matter with him?" she asked.

"Got a bone in his throat. Had it ever since supper, but he's so stubborn, he wouldn't say a word about it. Now it hurts so he can't stand it."

Her mother went on back downstairs, and Mary stood still in the middle of the room, her thoughts in a whirl. Jim wouldn't wait for her if she wasn't on time, she knew. He had said he wouldn't be made a fool of even for her. He'll think I've changed my mind, and he'll be done with me, she thought distractedly. What on earth am I going to do?

Then she had a daring inspiration. Purposefully, she finished her preparations and then stood a moment in front of her mirror looking at herself. The little dark figure in the blue suit and small veiled hat looked back at her.

I'm not good-looking. I never was, she decided. I'm just a little brown woman, but Jim wants me; he needs me. . . . I've done all I could for papa and mamma all my life.

She took up the note from the table and put it in her bag, put on her heavy coat, and lifted the suitcase from the floor. If she could get as far as the kitchen before her parents saw her —— Hurrying softly down the stairs, she hardly breathed. The door on her left was closed as she sped down the hall, but from it she could hear high argument, and for once in her life she was glad that her father and mother always bickered about everything. The thing to do now was to get the suitcase safely deposited on the path to the big gate. It was still quite dark as she stepped out onto the back porch from the kitchen. Then she ran around the house and dropped the case under a big oak in the grove. Back to the shed now where they kept the eight-year-old car.

I hate to tell a lie, she thought, standing just inside the shed to catch her breath, but papa could drive to town himself if he wanted to.

After a minute or two, she went back into the house and called to her father. "Papa, the car won't start, but I'll go down to the road and catch somebody going to town. You know today's Saturday, and people will be going early."

Before she could hear any protest, she was out the front door. She hurried down the steps and out into the yard. Already the light was beginning to change, and there was a faint stain of rose in the east. Mary looked up through the bare branches and saw that the stars had paled. But just above the rosy glow in the east a big planet burned. I wonder if it's Venus, she thought, and she could hear her heart thudding. Birds were calling and chirping all around her, though the air was cold and crisp. They knew it was spring.

Mary hurried down the path toward the field gate. The smell of freshly plowed earth arose in the cold air. The ground under her feet was crusty with frost. The soft rose began to fan out in the sky, and beyond the thin line of trees on the other side of the farm she could see a black object moving slowly.

That's Jim, she thought gladly, and hastened so that she would be at the rendezvous on time. When she reached the gate opening into the main road, the car was drawn up, waiting. Jim Matthews came to meet her. Mary looked at the tall, heavy-set figure. I've never really hesitated, she decided. I knew all the time I loved him.

He looked at her closely as he took the suitcase from her. "You all right, Miss Mary? You sure you won't be sorry?"

"Oh, Jim," she said huskily, "something's happened. You'll have to go up to the house and get papa. He's got a bone in his throat and wants to be taken to the doctor."

Jim smiled wryly. "Then the romantic escape is off?" he inquired.

"No," said Mary, her voice quivering slightly. "I'll go along, and we'll get married while he's having the bone out. We'll have a taxi waiting to take him home, and I'll leave the note I've written with the driver. You see, he thinks our car won't start."

"That's a mighty daring scheme," said Jim, and now he was laughing.

In Mary's pointed little brown face two red spots glowed. "Maybe you don't want to marry me," she countered.

For answer, Jim opened the car door and helped her in.

"I was only kidding you," he said in his soft drawl.

They drove back through the fields with the first warm rays of the sun at their backs. The frosty, upturned earth glittered under the fingers of light. As they stopped at the big gate, a flock of robins flew up nearby. He got back in the car after opening the gate and, turning to her, said, "Now I know why you want to run away." He gestured toward the birds. "'The lark's on the wing.'"

"But those are robins," said Mary, though her eyes shone.

"Yes," said Jim. "But 'The year's at the spring.'"

"Now you're making fun again. You think I'm trying to act young."

"No," said Jim, taking one of her small hands and holding it under his on the wheel. "I think you want what you've never had."

"And what's that?" asked Mary.

"Romance." And then he added, "I'm thankful to romance, Miss Mary, also to the fact that you want to mother the whole world. If you hadn't thought I needed you more than your papa and mamma do, you wouldn't be here with me this morning."

"You think you're smart, don't you?" said Mary. She looked toward the house and saw her father's obstinate little figure waiting on the front porch. And suddenly teardrops trembled on her eyelashes.

Oh, heavens! she breathed. It would be terrible if Jim saw me cry! She swallowed hard and concentrated on the thought of her grandmother, who had descended to her lover by means of a honeysuckle vine. "I wonder if she was wearing her hoop skirt," she said to Jim, smiling at his puzzled face through a rainbow mist.

small—approximately three hundred members—but is growing rapidly and the credit belongs to Dana. During the three years of his pastorate he has doubled the membership by working from eighty to ninety hours a week, which means he is away from home every evening. Dana's overtime hours occasion no comment and it is assumed he will gladly perform menial chores. Not long ago the head of the board of trustees requested him to drive posthaste to the hardware store, buy a box of washers and repair a leaky faucet in the church kitchen. Every faucet in our home leaks. Dana has no mechanical ability whatever, but he interrupted his scheduled appointments and put the church sink in apple-pie order.

"As a result of Dana's labors, his church has been painted and landscaped, and a new organ has been installed. There is a new carpet, the altar has been improved, and now a Sunday-school addition is being built. Nobody has said 'Thank you.' His salary remains the same as it was three years ago—thirty-eight hundred dollars. The janitor's wages have tripled.

"It hasn't occurred to the congregation that inflation affects a clergyman's family too. Our utility bills have climbed, but the church hasn't increased our utility allotment. Dana's solution is to snap off every light the instant he leaves a room. It's the same story with gasoline and car upkeep. Dana spends between fifty and sixty dollars of his own money every month to drive the automobile which he seldom uses except on church business. The kitchen stove in the parsonage is a disgrace and the wallpaper is hanging in tatters, but he makes no protest. Yet he fought like a saber-toothed tiger to raise twelve hundred dollars for painting the church.

"We economize rigidly on everything we eat and wear. Dana has to have two good suits, but in the house he wears patches and rags. My mother clothes our youngsters and I either do without or make over dresses that are years old. On the rare occasions I buy a new dress, the women in the congregation eye it as though doubtful I'd got good value for their Sunday contributions and by keeping a string on my dress, so to speak, make me hate it. I'm anything but extravagant, but Dana thinks himself a wiser shopper. He does all our grocery buying. He buys bargain staples in quantity—flour, bread, hamburger, lard, oatmeal, potatoes, canned vegetables, canned fruit and juices, powdered milk—but never a handful of raisins, a jar of sour cream, an exotic spice to lift an ordinary recipe out of the rut. And then, if it happens to occur to him, he complains because I've lost my interest in cooking.

"Left to himself, I'm sure Dana would complain little of my cooking and housekeeping; he is too unobservant. However, he is fantastically sensitive to the opinion of parishioners. The boys and I are at the mercy of three hundred prospective critics, represented by one critic-in-chief, Dana. If Chuck clatters down the church aisle and somebody frowns, Dana later calls the child to task. If a women's committee meets at the parsonage, he wants me to serve tea with real cream and nice little cakes—whatever the state of our finances.

"Several years ago my mother shipped me the baby grand piano my sister and I played on as young girls. One lady parishioner hinted that it was too elegant an instrument to be owned by a minister's family. The piano in her home was an upright. Dana took her mean-spirited attitude seriously. Seemingly he is unable to be loyal and stand up for me in anything. One day the church organist called and spied a pile of dirty dishes in the sink. Next morning Dana gave me a lecture on my inefficient housekeeping and insisted I wash the breakfast things promptly. Ordinarily Dana is blind to his surroundings—I can scrub our place spotless without attracting his notice or his praise—and oblivious of the food on his plate. By choice he would read straight through his meals.

"In the brief time Dana does spend at home he contributes nothing except his physical presence. He feels no obligation to talk to me and the boys or listen to us. If I comment on his work at the church, if I speak of Johnnie's troubles at school or Chuck's latest crying spell, my remarks fall on deaf ears. Dana is already deep in some book. He uses our home as a library, a boardinghouse and a place to sleep.

"Dana and I have no recreation as I understand the term. When we do go out for an evening, we attend some church affair and Dana has to work at making it a success. We haven't gone on a family vacation in years. Dana is tireless at arranging picnics and outings for other people's children; he has yet to take our youngsters on an overnight camping trip.

"Dana is too self-sufficient and preoccupied to require intimate friendships. I'm not that way. Often, on lonesome evenings when the boys are asleep and he is off somewhere listening to the troubles of other people, I feel literally starved by the need of a real friend. I can't choose a friend—somebody I can trust and with whom I can be myself—from the congregation. Once when Dana was serving an Eastern church I confided to a woman I trusted that I wasn't enthusiastic about the Sunday-school superintendent. Within a week the church was engaged in a row that haunts Dana to this day.

"When I fell in love with Dana I felt very different about his church—our church. I was only eighteen and just beginning music school when we met at a sorority dance. Dana was twenty-four and still five years from his ordination—family obligations had interrupted his education—and I was impressed by his maturity, his strength, his manliness. I admired his idealism and his sense of purpose. I quit music school and took a twenty-five-dollar-a-week stenographic job so we could be married while he was still a student. I soon discovered what it meant to become the wife of a dedicated man. I'd had romantic visions of meeting my husband at the door every evening with a kiss, handing him his robe and slippers, and then feeding him a delicious hot meal. Dana was carrying a full-time, underpaid job at the Student Union as well as a full-time college course. He invariably arrived home hours late, so dazed with fatigue he responded to my kiss with a peck on the cheek, or didn't respond at all. Often he was too tired to eat, but he was never too tired to study.

"Our marriage put an immediate end to dancing, fun and even movies. For the two years Dana was completing his undergraduate work, we saved every extra penny to help with his expenses. The seminary is located in a large Eastern city. During the three years we lived there I used to beg Dana to take me to a night club for a special treat—to celebrate a birthday or anniversary—so I could see a floor show and hear a top-flight orchestra. He never felt we could spare the time and money—although I was working too. Occasionally I bought a ticket to a concert but I went alone and felt guilty at squandering money he always seemed to need to buy books. He thought I should satisfy my hunger for music by listening to the radio.

"Johnnie was born in his father's last term at the seminary. At that time Dana was attending classes sixteen hours a week, and was studying twice as many hours to win straight A marks. He was a part-time minister, preaching two Sundays a month. He worked as a lunchroom checker to pay for

Of all the noisemakers we know, one of the least pleasant to listen to is a Soup Slurper. It surprises even itself with the noise it makes with a spoonful of soup. It gurgles and slurps such horrible sounds when it eats that other people want to leave the room in disgust. Just listen to the sour music that comes from the mouth of a Soup Slurper sometime and you will promise yourself never, never to be one.

When you decorate an Easter ham with DEL MONTE Pineapple as you see on opposite page, or with DEL MONTE Pineapple Chunks, as in the photo above, here's a marvelous glaze to use:

PINEAPPLE-HONEY GLAZE:

In a saucepan, mix 3 tablesp. flour, 1 teasp. dry mustard, ¾ cup syrup from DEL MONTE Pineapple. Add ¾ cup strained honey. Cook till thickened and clear. Spread on baked, skinned, and scored ham. Fasten DEL MONTE Pineapple slices and maraschino cherries or DEL MONTE Pineapple Chunks to ham with toothpicks. Return to oven for 20 min.

Or make a luscious sauce with DEL MONTE Raisins!

Everybody loves a sauce rich with the flavor of DEL MONTE Brand Seedless Raisins. Serve it with your Easter ham, or let it dress up the leftovers. You're sure of success when you start with DEL MONTE Raisins—they're so sweet and fresh-tasting. And what a joy to use from their handy wax-wrap carton! Get some today. Then try

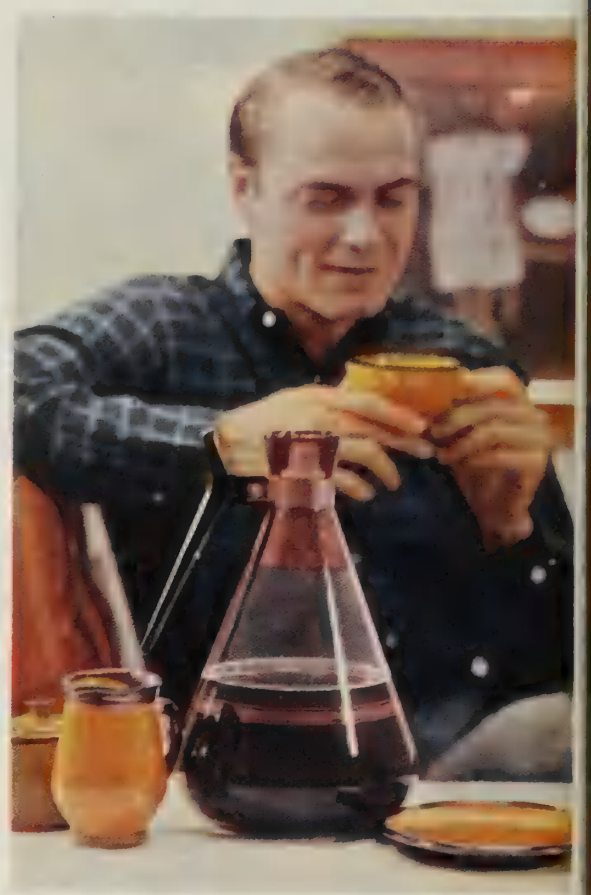
"Do-it-yourself" is easier–with a "Coffee-break"

Keep some baby oil or soft soap on your hands, especially the nails and cuticles, for easy wash-up after painting. For a restful, zestful "lift" on the job, give yourself an occasional "Coffee-break"!

Upholstering is a two-fisted job. Hold fabric or webbing taut with one hand, hammer tacks in with the other – a magnetic hammer picks up the tacks for you. A good, full-bodied cup of coffee makes work easier.



Less chance of the big ones getting away if your equipment is in top order beforehand. For tops in coffee every time, too: use 1 Standard Measure (2 level tablespoons) for each 6-oz. cup of cold water.

What's the pleasantest way to avoid "Gardener's back"?–a "Coffee-break"! Planting hint: don't skimp on stakes – tie up all the young plants you want to grow strong, straight and healthy.

Smart carpenters when working in hardwoods, use soap on screws or saws. And they cool off with good Iced Coffee. Hint: Freeze coffee cubes in refrigerator trays and use with regular strength coffee. It won't dilute.

Now with the job well done, you owe yourself a rest and a reward – a "special recipe" coffee! For the colorful 32-page booklet, "Fun With Coffee," send 25¢ and your name and address to the Coffee Bureau.

is meals and held still another part-time job n a slum hotel to cover the cost of our lodgngs there. The hotel—we had one cramped, rimy room without bath—wasn't suitable for hildren. I gave up my job in December and ent home to bear my first son. I was in no urry to return.

"When Dana was ordained the following une, he convinced me that at last we would ave the chance to spend some time together, hare each other's interests and become loving ompanions. That was ten years ago. Dana as served four different churches and each as absorbed all his time and attention and ft nothing for me and the boys.

"Dana and I have now drifted far apart. requently a day will go by without our exhanging a word. Months ago Dana began leeping on the living-room sofa to avoid isturbing me, he said, but I know he wanted o avoid listening to my endless complaints. Ay constant nagging at him is hard on our oys. Dana's indifference to his responsibilies as a father is equally hard on them. They ould be better off if they—and I—were livng back in Ohio with ny mother.

"I am sure that Dana von't leave the church. Consequently I feel that permanent separation s the answer for us. Can you advise me how o divorce my husband vith as little damage to is career as possible?"

DANA TELLS HIS SIDE:

"My wife was more nature as a bride than he is now," said thirtynine-year-old Dana. Tall and lean, fair hair blurred with gray, he had a proud yet ascetic face. "Or maybe it just seems that way in retrospect. I'm now inclined to wonder whether Lucy wasn't in search of a doting protector rather than a fallible, average husband when she married me. Her father, only moderately prosperous, indulged both his daughters to a ridiculous extent.

"My father died when was eleven years old, just as the depression was beginning. He left a sizable estate, around two hundred thousand dollars. Inside a few months his investments were wiped out and my mother was confronted with the problem of providing food, clothing and shelter for me and my three small sisters. She supported us by brutally hard work—harder work than Lucy can conceive of—with a very little help from me. Overnight, you might say, I was pitchforked from childhood into becoming the man of the family.

"I went to work in a grocery store. I unloaded fresh produce in the early mornings before school, and in the evenings I delivered groceries at five cents a delivery. Each payday handed my earnings, four or five dollars, to my mother. She offered to return an allowance to me, but I wouldn't take it, preferring to hear her praise my unselfishness.

"Although I was always pressed for time to study, I was expected to be a good example to my sisters and keep my grades high. I will never forget my mother's shock, the look on her face, the day I brought home a report card with a C in arithmetic. I didn't like arithmetic, but the next term I saw to it I got an A. Throughout my schooling I've consistently outranked students more gifted than myself. My mother taught me self-discipline and industry, the importance of making use of minutes as well as hours.

"My mother is a remarkable woman. When I finished high school at sixteen—I was class valedictorian—she had worked up from stock girl to assistant buyer in a large department store. She offered to finance my college education, but my three sisters needed her assistance more than I did. So I went to work in a bank and began a program of systematic saving. It took me six years to acquire the money for college.

"During those years I debated my choice of career. I was determined to use my life to accomplish something. I met a man, a clergyman, who was establishing boys' clubs among the underprivileged, the hungry kids of depression days. After banking hours I did voluntary work with him. I discovered his life had meaning and value and, I suppose, I chose him for my model.

"When I met Lucy I was an overage college junior with the long pull toward the ministry still ahead of me. I didn't intend to marry until I was thirty. In one evening Lucy changed my mind. I wish you could have known her then. In those days she was sweet and uncomplaining, an eager sharer of my ideas and my ideals.

"Again and again Lucy assured me that she was prepared for struggle and hardship, that she was willing to undertake the obligations involved in becoming a clergyman's wife. She now seems to think she was miserable with me from the beginning. My memory is different. In those days Lucy didn't mind living on a modest scale. But she soon began to object whenever I hit the books. If she called from the stove while I was studying at the kitchen table, and I was too absorbed to hear her, she was annoyed and would try to provoke a quarrel. Seemingly Lucy likes the drama of dissension and quarreling. I don't. One evening I was concentrating on a particularly tough assignment and she borrowed a camera and stood in front of me and took a time exposure. The fact that I didn't raise my eyes from my textbook or notice the camera until she shouted at me made her extremely angry. At the end of our first year I moved my textbooks out of our room and thereafter did all my studying in the college library. Lucy then complained that we spent too little time together.

"Except for her dissatisfaction I would have been ideally happy in my three years at the seminary. Despite fatigue—I averaged five hours' sleep a night—every morning I awoke full of energy and to the knowledge I had drawn one day closer to my goal. Lucy just couldn't seem to share in the joy of our common achievement. While she was pregnant with our oldest son, she proposed that I quit the ministry. At my refusal—how could I not refuse?—she packed and left me and went back to her parents. My term examinations were coming up and I was in no position to stop her.

"I thought her condition explained her attitude; that motherhood would help her grow up. When Johnnie was born, she telegraphed and asked for a divorce. On the day I completed the last of my examinations I took to the road and hitchhiked to see her and the baby, arriving so exhausted that my mother-in-law bundled me off to bed where I slept for thirty-six hours. My mother-in-law showed me far more sympathy than did Lucy. She refused to return for my ordination.

"I was preaching in my first church before I was able to induce her to join me with our baby. She complained that our first parsonage—it had fourteen rooms—was too large, too drafty, too hard to heat. She complains the present parsonage is too small. She com-

His lashes grow like vines upon a string
In tendril mirth, one on another curling;
Laugh-along-lids, a foliole upfurling,
As though with fronds he formed a leafy dwelling,
For eyes-in-awnings is all that he seems.

These lashes turn and multiply in dreams
And run upon my arm with trellis step,
Lace up my living in a lattice net ——
Oh, he could snare the sun by such soft means plained that my salary was inadequate, ignoring the fact that all new clergymen receive inadequate incomes. She complained we had no car as she now complains she has too little opportunity to drive our car.

"I deliberately sought out my present post in the hope she would be more content in California. Lucy takes no pride in the tremendous growth of our church; she merely complains that I'm away too much, don't earn enough, and that our living accommodations are poor. If she will only be patient, my salary is certain to be raised; the parsonage will be refurbished when the more urgent needs of the church are met.

"I have tried to be patient and understanding with Lucy, as has the congregation. She does practically no work for the church; she is musically talented, but she doesn't assist with our music programs. Two Sundays out of four she doesn't attend the morning services, explaining that to listen to my sermons makes her feel like a hypocrite. It doesn't occur to her that I might feel hypocritical when I excuse her frequent absences on the grounds of illness, and refrain from adding that the illnesses are psychosomatic.

"In my opinion the time has come for Lucy to master her nervous system, assume responsibility, shoulder her share of the burden. It is time for her to behave like a grown woman, a wife and a mother. Although she loves our children, she neglects them. Since I'm unable to be with my sons as much as I would like—there are only twenty-four hours in a day—I feel she should give them extra attention. While she lies abed nursing a headache Johnnie needs her assistance with his homework and Chuck needs her encouragement to be friendly with other youngsters. Johnnie is falling behind in his studies and Chuck is too shy and withdrawn for his age. When the boys are older and I'm less harried and driven, I expect to get closer to them. "I've had considerable training in psychology—I've done marital counseling myself—but my own marriage and my own wife baffle me. Sometimes I'm afraid Lucy may do something to cause an open scandal. Sometimes in her uncontrollable rages she is actually irrational. I love my wife and sons. I will do anything within reason to help Lucy. But I cannot give up my lifework or consider a divorce."

THE MARRIAGE COUNSELOR SAYS:

"Most people are aware of the tremendous rebirth of religious interest in this country. Few people are aware of the burdens placed upon clergymen—and their families. Preparing and preaching a sermon is the smallest part of the average clergyman's duties.

"The modern-day clergyman is expected to be an expert in many fields. He is expected to organize and operate fund-raising drives, to be an administrator, responsible for the financial health and physical upkeep of the church. He is expected to be a force for good in the community, supporting and giving his time to numerous civic activities only remotely connected with the church—and to call on and welcome newcomers, to give psychological counseling to the troubled, to marry the living and bury the dead.

"Dana possessed unusual energy and determination. In his boyhood he acquired the habit of sleeping considerably less than the average and working far harder to accomplish an objective. The training of his mother, who asked for and received more emotional support and financial assistance from a young boy than the average mother, imbued him with a remarkable indifference to hardships. At times, as I talked to him and Lucy, I got the impression he almost embraced hardship, perhaps as a test of his own strength.

"When Dana married he forgot the old saying: Many men receive a 'call' to the ministry; few women feel they have been 'called' to become the wife of a minister. Lucy fell in love with and married a man, not his job. To her, Dana's talk of his future was thrilling and romantic, but removed from reality. As a bride of eighteen—remember, he was a serious-minded man of twenty-four—she retained a natural interest in gaiety and fun. Then, too, she had much less stamina and endurance than her husband.

"For a while she deferred to Dana's superiority in age and intelligence—it became fairly clear in our interviews she had originally been drawn to him by his protectiveness and a fancied resemblance to her father—and meekly accepted a Spartan regime on his say-so. Before the birth of their first son, however, the seeds of rebellion were sprouting. Dana's hard work had purpose and meaning while her hard work, she thought, was slavery.

"Dana studied psychology, but expended little of his knowledge on the study of his wife. Because he felt fulfilled, joyfully adequate to the drudgery incidental to his lifework, he assumed Lucy shared his feelings and he insisted upon believing that his goals were her goals. A stubborn as well as a dedicated man, he ignored strong evidence to the contrary and brushed aside her desires as childish. In some ways Lucy was inclined to be childish, but her yearning for some measure of personal self-expression wasn't childish.

"The welfare of their young sons became another bone of contention. Lucy believed boys should be the responsibility of a father. Dana believed Lucy should be both mother and father, since he felt his negligence justified by the good works he was accomplishing. At the time I met Lucy her frustrations were undermining her nervous system and health and were rapidly making it impossible for her to be an adequate wife, mother or human being.

"When Dana and I met, despite the deterioration of his marriage, it was inconceivable to him that Lucy actually intended to carry out her threats and divorce him. Clergymen simply did not appear in the divorce court. It took me six weeks to convince him that his wife was in earnest, that he must make adjustments if he wished to hold the marriage together. I tried to show him how it appeared from Lucy's point of view. Eventually he conceded that the past fifteen years had contained great satisfactions for him and few for her.

Scour your coffee pot with S.O.S®

Good Housekeeping Institute tells you why:

"When coffee oils, stale odors and stains are allowed to accumulate (as they do rapidly in many coffee pots...) true coffee flavor is masked or changed. You can prevent this, but...special treatment is needed to do the job. For all aluminum coffee pots, nothing cleans as well as soap-filled steel wool pads."

"In accepting the California church, for example, he had been unselfishly inspired by the wish to please Lucy with a change of scene. To Dana the tumble-down, poorly attended, impoverished church represented a fruitful field of service. He felt richly rewarded for three years of unflagging labor by his success in meeting and surmounting difficulties. Lucy felt no such reward. When Dana pushed the congregation to pay for sprucing up the church instead of pushing for an increase in his salary, Lucy felt the plaster and paint had been bought at the expense of her children and her. In a way, she was right.

"Ordinarily I do very little of what we call 'directive' counseling, because I've found it wiser to help a client to think through and 'direct' changes in personality patterns on his own. But Dana and Lucy were sunk so deep in their bog of mutual misunderstanding I did make some concrete suggestions.

"I suggested to Dana that he spend one day a week with his family, regardless of the pressure of his pastoral duties. This meant a movie, a hike, a picnic, or an outing to the beach—planned and carried out, no matter what. On one of those occasions, remindful of a childish but often expressed dream of Lucy's, he took her to a night club in Los Angeles. That was Dana's idea. Once was enough; as soon as Lucy's dream was realized, her appetite for garish glamour was sated.

"I suggested to Dana that he devote his exclusive attention to his wife and sons for a minimum of one hour every evening, which seemed fair enough in view of the fact he was putting in an eleven- or twelve-hour day for the church. While Lucy was cooking and serving the meal he was to talk to and listen to her—or to play with his boys. He was not to thumb through a church report; most particularly he was not to pick up and read a book. This practice had irritated Lucy to the point of hysteria, for it indicated her husband felt himself too busy to spend a few minutes on her and the youngsters.

"Dana had to will himself to overcome habit. When he came home in the evening his hands unthinkingly groped for a book, and then, a few moments later, groped again. Lucy also had a lesson to master. She had to learn to allow Dana to cure himself of his bad habit, a more difficult trick than you might think. When she saw Dana's hand unconsciously move toward a book, her body automatically stiffened and she had an instantaneous impulse to utter a sharp, unpleasant remark. It was after she learned to stifle the sharp remarks that Dana freed himself of the habit of picking up a book to occupy every spare moment. Frequently, with married couples, it takes two to break a habit.

"After Dana rid himself of his preoccupations he began to enjoy the evening family hour. He and his boys discovered the pleasure of companionship, and the tensions between him and Lucy began to lift. Their sexual life was resumed.

"The financial problem remained. There just wasn't money enough to meet their expenses. The week after young Chuck entered kindergarten, Lucy found a woman to care for the youngsters afternoons and found herself a well-paid secretarial job. Lucy paid ten dollars a week from her income on a three-hundred-dollar bank loan and, by agreement with Dana, spent the remainder of her salary as she pleased. It gave her a feeling of independence and freedom for the first time in years. She could buy the dress, the hat that appealed to her taste, and without dreading the congregation's criticism. She could buy Johnnie a bike or Chuck a toy fire engine, because the money was hers. She became the grocery buyer as well. Another suggestion of mine to Dana was that Lucy be permitted to select the food she was expected to cook, even though an occasional bargain might be missed.

"The family motorcar had been a source of family bitterness. Dana's parish was a sprawling one and his generous use of the car on church business was the principal reason the family was steadily going in debt. A parsimonious, unthinking congregation allowed him for official expenses roughly half of the amount he actually spent on driving. I made a suggestion to Dana: that Lucy be permitted to use the family car one day a week. This had curious but satisfactory repercussions. A member of the board of trustees asked Dana to run an errand on a day Lucy had the car. When Dana explained why he and his automobile were unavailable, the whole story of the church's niggardliness on gasoline expenses reached an influential member. He called a meeting of the trustees and the car budget was set at a realistic level. A few months later this same board member saw to it that Dana's salary was raised to forty-four hundred dollars. This is hardly munificent, but it enabled Lucy to quit a job that had already served its purpose.

"In a town adjoining Dana's parish is one of California's excellent small colleges. Lucy took up the musical studies interrupted by her youthful marriage, and the grand piano in the parsonage had meaning again. Lucy had regarded the church as a personal enemy, and it seemed to me evidence of a sound personal readjustment when she volunteered to direct the choir's musical programs. She still is not the ideal minister's wife, but who can be? Lucy now attends church regularly every Sunday. She hasn't had a migraine attack in four months. Dana is conscious of her problems and she understands his. They and their boys will always live in a floodlight. They belong to their people as all clergymen's families do. It may be unfair, but it's inevitable."

DIAMOND SPRING GARDEN SALAD

- 2 pkgs. apple-flavored gelatin dessert
- 3 cups boiling water
- 1 can (13½ oz.) pineapple chunks, drained
- Syrup from pineapple chunks
- 10 maraschino cherries, cut in half
- ½ cup chopped Diamond Walnuts
- 1 cup shredded carrots
- ¼ cup chopped green pepper

Dissolve gelatin in boiling water. Add syrup from pineapple. When gelatin begins to thicken, divide in half. To one part, add pineapple chunks, cherries and one-half of the crisp, chopped Diamond Walnuts. Pour into 6-cup mold. Chill. Add remaining ingredients to the rest of the gelatin. Pour over first layer. Chill until ready to serve. Unmold on lettuce. Garnish with mayonnaise—crown with sparkling Diamond Walnut halves. Serves 6.

Tempting Lenten eating for a week on a rock-bottom budget of $5.80 per person.

By LIANE WAITE

Golden pot roast, savory stew and tender flaky sea foods will give delightful spring eating—even if the market list is restricted by a rock-bottom budget.

In shopping for these menus I found that six people had interesting, varied and filling meals on $5.80 a person for the week. The market basket contained hidden economies, not recognizable in the finished recipes, but very recognizable in the savings on the bill. These included dry milk powder, frozen vegetables and fruit juices, instant coffee, powdered-cream compound and day-old breads. Salads and relishes are included in abundance, and homemade desserts save pennies. Best part of shopping is finding out what the butcher has in store. Each community has a different way of cutting meats and you will find special less-expensive cuts of lamb or beef if you try. Recipes included here are for foods available across the country to everyone. However, making use of community features is smart and may net you your Easter bonnet. Prices are based on margarine, but of course you may use butter if you prefer.

Clam-Noodle Scallop. Add 3 teaspoons salt to 3 quarts rapidly boiling water. Then gradually add one 8-ounce package egg noodles. Boil, uncovered, for about 10 minutes until noodles are tender. Drain and rinse them with cold water. Meanwhile, in a skillet melt 2 tablespoons margarine and blend in 2 tablespoons flour. Drain the liquid from two 10-ounce cans minced clams and gradually stir it into the flour and margarine. Then add ½ cup chili sauce, 2 teaspoons minced onion and 1 teaspoon salt. Cook until thickened and smooth, stirring constantly. Add the clams. In a large greased casserole, place a layer of the cooked noodles, then half the clam sauce, the remaining noodles and the final bit of sauce. Sprinkle with ½ cup grated Parmesan cheese and dot with margarine. Bake in a moderately hot oven, 375° F., until golden brown on top, about 15 minutes.

Shrimp-and-Haddock Bake. Cut two 12-ounce frozen blocks of haddock or cod into 1" cubes. This can easily be done with a heavy knife, but be sure the fish is still frozen before cutting. Make a cream sauce with 5 tablespoons margarine, 6 tablespoons flour, 1½ cups milk and 1½ cups water. Cook until thickened. Season with 3 tablespoons grated onion, 1½ tablespoons lemon juice, 1¾ teaspoons salt, ¼ teaspoon pepper and a pinch each of paprika and mixed herbs. Tumble fish cubes and 1 cup cooked, shelled and deveined shrimp into a 2-quart baking dish. Pour the sauce over all and bake in a very hot oven, 425° F., for 10 minutes. Remove from oven and stir only once. Top with the biscuits and continue baking for another 10–15 minutes, until biscuits are golden brown and the fish is flaky.

Biscuits: To the dry ingredients of your favorite biscuit recipe add ½ teaspoon each of marjoram, thyme and paprika. Proceed as directed, topping the casserole with a ring of biscuits. Bake the rest separately and serve them with the casserole.

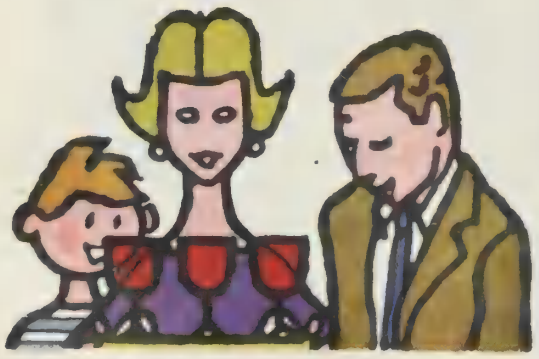
Why are 9 out of 10 dieters unsuccessful?

Have you ever tried dieting?

If you have, you won't be surprised to learn that only about 1 dieter in 10 is really successful. That is, 1 in 10 stays within his calorie limit and loses the desired number of pounds.

It's no fun watching other people enjoy dessert while you try to drown your craving for sweets in a cup of black coffee. That's why, if you're a weight watcher, you'll bless the day you discovered new low-calorie D-Zerta Puddings—Chocolate, Vanilla and Butterscotch.

Made by the makers of Jell-O desserts. These sweet, satisfying D-Zerta Puddings do wonders for a reducer's morale. They have all the flavor of America's best-liked puddings—yet, they contain no sugar and they're incredibly low in calories!



Chocolate Pudding only 54 calories! When you mix D-Zerta Puddings with skim milk, a serving contains 54 calories. If you use whole milk, count 94 calories. (There are 377 in a piece of apple pie. Even a portion of orange water ice contains 177!)

The family will love D-Zerta. "Well, I have to cook for the whole family" is no longer an excuse for calorie-heavy desserts. New D-Zerta Puddings are so good everybody enjoys them. There are 3 envelopes in each box—2 servings in each envelope. Get several packages at a time and mix the flavors if you like—the combination of Vanilla and Chocolate is a great favorite.

You'll like D-Zerta Gelatin, too. D-Zerta Gelatin is another boon to reducers. It comes in the 6 famous Jell-O flavors: Strawberry, Raspberry, Cherry, Orange, Lemon and Lime, and costs only pennies per serving.

With this sweet, low-calorie gelatin you can make bright, tempting desserts and such refreshing salads! And weight watchers can eat all they want, because D-Zerta Gelatin contains no sugar and only 12 calories in a serving. Think of it—only 12 calories! Hardly enough to count.

Instead of pound-producing, inch-adding desserts—serve delicious D-ZERTA PUDDINGS AND GELATINS. D-ZERTA is the sweetest friend a weight watcher ever had.

epoch, as usual, has been unjust, and only now are we beginning to realize that both the philosophy of romanticism and the era that produced it were extraordinarily rich in every branch of creative activity.

One of the features of romanticism which we find most difficult to accept is the Victorian tendency to see everything in extremes. Thus a good man to our grandparents was an almost supernatural being, a knight of the Round Table, brave as he was handsome, who would sally forth with a fanfare of trumpets to do battle with scaly monsters and rescue his beloved. This exaggeration applied equally to abstract ideas: for example, darkness to the romanticist was either a starlit paradise in which lovers strolled amid cypresses by blue lake shores, or else it was a cloak for terror in which vampires or hellhounds swarmed out of the cemeteries to pursue hapless travelers on lonely roads. This fear of the unknown symbolized by darkness is illustrated by Corot in this painting, and a few years ago critics would have passed by the picture with an amused smile. The cycle of taste, however, is changing, and we are beginning to understand that Corot with his language of romanticism was one of the towering figures of the mid-nineteenth century who expressed the truth about the world honestly and without compromise. "It is better to be nothing at all," he said, "than to imitate the work of others. . . . Beauty in art is the truth which has been saturated with the direct impressions one receives from Nature."

When he died a lifelong bachelor at the age of seventy-nine, Corot was the most successful painter in Europe—his silvery landscapes hung in honored positions in every art museum, and reproductions of his woodland scenes were the standard decoration of the Victorian living room. He himself could never understand the success, and—a kindly man—he used to sign the magic word COROT to the canvases of his friends so that they could share in his bonanza and sell their paintings as his on the fashionable market. Perhaps the most extraordinary feature of this great artist's career is that although he painted all his life and produced hundreds of canvases, he never sold a single one until he was past fifty.

HEREWARD LESTER COOKE

I drove Bobby's car out West. We were gone forty days and covered ten thousand miles, and in all that time, in all that space, I was completely free. The road raced beneath the wheels, and I had merely to observe as plains and prairies, canyons and mountains, pines and sagebrush glided past as in a motion-picture travelogue.

That same summer and on that same trip I fell under the spell of the writing of F. Scott Fitzgerald. At first, perhaps, I was drawn by the fact that, like myself, he had grown up in the Middle West, that, like myself, he had been a Princeton man, that my uncle had known him in college, and that I knew his daughter, Scotty. I was hypnotized by his writing, and for days after finishing a book, or even a short story, I experienced something very akin to a hang-over from the continuing force of the mood it put upon me. I saw my world in his terms. More important, I saw myself as Amory Blaine or Dick Diver. When I returned to Princeton in the fall I had begun to view the slow disintegration of my will as a literary, aesthetic and somehow romantic process.

Among all the strange things that men have forgotten, the most universal lapse of memory is that by which they have forgotten they are living on a star.

G. K. CHESTERTON

This passivity did not apply to the pursuit of pleasure, and I was anything but passive in my participation in the Triangle Club. This venerable musical-comedy organization had been founded by Booth Tarkington some fifty years before, and its glamour had been heightened by such alumni as James Stewart, Joshua Logan, José Ferrer, Myron McCormick, and Fitzgerald himself. Although I was only a member of the dancing chorus, I was completely carried away by the rehearsals, the tension of opening night and the electric response of the audience.

Over vacation, we went on tour, and for the first time in my life I was away from home on Christmas.

We traveled from the seaboard to the Middle West and played a dozen one-night stands. In every city there were parties, alumni banquets, debutante dances. I returned to college physically exhausted and mentally unbalanced by the wonder of our triumph. Princeton was, indeed, the closest thing to Eden this side of Paradise.

The emotional aftermath of the Triangle produced a mounting disenchantment. After the loneliness of Army life I had been overwhelmed by the sense of group belonging and for the past year and a half I had been playing at the role of college boy. Joyously, consciously I had sought to efface every trace of my past self.

It was with some dim foreboding that I approached the spring elections to the upper-class eating clubs, which, at Princeton, parallel the Greek-letter fraternities in other colleges and universities. With "Bicker Week" three weeks away I wrote a letter to my father, announcing my intention not to join a club. This was no protest against the social snobbishness of the clubs. More likely, it was an attempt to check the snobbishness I recognized within the strange and unknown self I was becoming. Yet I could not bring myself to state this outright, and I ought to have felt no rebuff in my father's prompt reply. Gently he reminded me that there were real, as well as snobbish, social values in the clubs, and concluded by advising me I must not be "quixotic." A few days later, I had plunged into the frantic negotiations of the "bicker" with all the enthusiasm of a born joiner. When the dust had settled, I found myself with most of my friends a member of the Cottage Club, my uncle's club, Fitzgerald's club, the club I had always hoped and secretly expected I would join.

Again, that summer, I did not take a job. My father had fulfilled a lifelong dream by purchasing a farm in Litchfield, Connecticut, where he hoped soon to retire. There was a great deal of tidying up to be done around the dilapidated old farmhouse, and for about half the summer I spent my days working on the place. Each morning I dropped my father at the recruiting center in Hartford and drove the thirty miles to Litchfield, where I filled the day gathering up and burning the accumulated debris of the past, dismantling the rambling porch and staggering chicken house, splitting and stacking kindling. Two or three carpenters were remodeling the interior, but they remained inside, and until my parents drove out to join me in the late afternoon my solitude was virtually complete.

I made no move to break this isolation, but stayed within myself, preoccupied with thoughts which seldom rose above the level of mere dreams. On the surface, I had no troubles. I had good grades and good friends. I had all the physical comforts, youth, good health, and the affection of a loving family. The fact that all these blessings were meaningless to me, that I had no use for them in meeting a challenge, because there was no

"Get more nourishment for less money with Starlac®, the heart of milk," says Elsie, the Borden Cow

Why is Starlac, Borden's nonfat dry milk, so good for you? Because it's the heart of milk . . . contains all the proteins, B vitamins, and minerals of the finest pasteurized milk.

Since water and fat have been removed, it costs less . . . as low as 7¢ a quart in the 12-qt. package. Slightly higher in other sizes.

Starlac mixes instantly, dissolves completely, even in ice water. Tastes like what it is—the delicious heart of milk. So convenient for cooking and baking! Use Starlac in all your "made-with-milk" recipes.

Baked turkey ring with Starlac. Every time you add Starlac to chopped meats and casseroles, you add extra nutrition. Starlac improves the texture of meat and fowl dishes and makes gravy smoother.

Delicious desserts with Starlac. Upside-down cake made with Starlac is never soggy and it tastes wonderful! Starlac makes pastry brown better, and milk desserts made with Starlac are smoother.

BUTTERSCOTCH TOASTED OATS

Use as delicious topping and easy pie crust

4 cups Quaker or Mother's Oats (quick or old fashioned, uncooked)
1 cup brown sugar
⅔ cup melted butter or margarine

TOPPING: Mix all ingredients together until crumbly. Place in shallow pan. (Do not pack down.) Toast in moderate oven (350°F.) 10 minutes, stirring occasionally. Cool 15 minutes, then toss lightly with a fork to form crumbs. Store in covered jar in refrigerator; use as needed. Stir with fork before using. Serve as topping on ice cream, puddings, baked desserts.

EASY PIE CRUST: For 9-inch crust, combine 1¾ cups oats topping and 2 tablespoons melted butter or margarine. Pack on bottom and sides of pie plate. Place another pie plate on top of crust; chill. Remove plate and fill crust with desired filling.

High-protein Quaker Oats adds nut-like goodness to desserts and cookies—extra juiciness to meat dishes

Quaker Oats and Mother's Oats are exactly the same

RAINBOW OATMEAL COOKIES

1 cup butter or margarine
½ cup confectioners' sugar
1 teaspoons vanilla
2 cups sifted enriched flour
½ teaspoon salt
1 cup Quaker or Mother's Oats (quick or old fashioned, uncooked)

Beat butter until creamy. Add sugar gradually; beat until fluffy. Add vanilla. Sift together flour and salt; add to creamed mixture, mixing thoroughly. Stir in oats until blended. (Dough will be quite stiff.) Shape into logs. Place on ungreased cookie sheets. Bake in slow oven (325°F.) 20 to 25 minutes; cool. Makes 3 dozen cookies.

Frost cookies by placing them on a wire rack and then pouring thin confectioners' sugar frostings tinted rainbow colors over them.

LOW CALORIE—HIGH PROTEIN OATMEAL BREAKFAST

High-protein Quaker Oats sticks to your ribs—supplies strength and energy all morning long. That's because a piping hot bowl of creamy-delicious Quaker Oats gives you 9 grams of protein. In fact, oatmeal is the richest in protein of any whole-grain cereal. Yet (weight watchers, please note) your good hot Quaker Oats breakfast—including milk and sugar—is only 210 calories.

NOTE FOR FAST BREAKFASTS: Quick Quaker Oats requires only 1 minute of actual cooking. Or, if you prefer the flavor and texture of old-style oatmeal, try Old Fashioned Quaker Oats.

JUICY HAMBURGER SANDWICHES

1½ pounds ground beef
¾ cup Quaker or Mother's Oats (quick or old fashioned, uncooked)
¼ cup chopped onion
2 teaspoons salt
¼ teaspoon pepper
1 cup tomato juice

Combine all ingredients thoroughly. Shape into 8 hamburgers; chill. Pan-fry in hot fat and serve on buns with favorite garnish.

JUICY MEAT LOAF: Combine all ingredients thoroughly, adding 2 beaten eggs. Pack firmly into a loaf pan. Bake in a moderate oven (350°F.) 1 hour. Let stand 5 minutes before slicing. Makes 8 servings.

challenge, was something I did not know how to say.

In August, I left home to spend the remaining weeks with my sister and brother-in-law, who had taken a summer cottage in Mantoloking, on the Jersey shore. My younger brother was there too. I sailed and swam and went to dances, dated girls and drank with college friends to bury my depression underneath the surface laughter. Back at Princeton in the fall, I plunged into the Triangle and lost myself in parties.

Toward Christmas, the mounting strain produced another convulsive effort of renunciation like those of the preceding spring. Participation in the Triangle that fall had been a repetition of my sophomore year, with the same effect upon my studies. Now though my outer self looked forward to the Christmas tour, I knew I ought to study during vacation, but more than that I felt a desperate need of being with my family.Two weeks with them might re-establish contact with the past, restore the sense of self I once had known. The more I thought about it, the more desperate I became, and in the end I went to the director to announce my resignation. I might as well have thrown a bombshell. The outraged protestations of my friends ran high with indignation. What did I think I was trying to do? And why? I could not answer their questions, but I was determined not to yield as in the spring before, so I made up shuffling excuses.

Two days before the Triangle was to depart, I was relieved of the burden of decision. At seven o'clock in the evening I entered the infirmary with a stomach-ache. At four the following morning I was operated on for acute appendicitis. The appendectomy mitigated the disgrace of having left the show and offered me a temporary respite from other responsibilities. In the end, however, this respite proved too short. During my ten days in the hospital, I accomplished nothing in the way of study, and in the short time left at home I found it impossible to make any real contact with my parents.

Back in Princeton, I was placed under increasing academic pressure. I had been slipping and sliding past one course after another with better-than-average grades, but this was my junior year, and, as a departmental student in art and archaeology, I was required to write a paper of not less than ten thousand words on the formation of the classic style from Knossos to Pompeii. I tried to work, but the years of loafing had left me nearly invertebrate. Time and again, I placed myself before my typewriter, but I seemed not to know how to begin. The deadline came and went and still I could do nothing. Before the second term began there were a few days without classes in which I might have hoped to finish up the paper. Instead I launched into a week of calculated drinking. When it was over, I had lost the last shred of hope, and even now, sixteen years later, I am overwhelmed by a wave of physical nausea at the memory of its disgraceful climax.

A group of us had been drinking down at the Nassau Tavern, and, reluctant to call a halt to the festivities at the midnight curfew, we bought a couple of cases of beer and carried them back to the room. Physiologically, I was unquestionably drunk, and yet the objective spectator in myself seemed to be functioning with perfect precision. There were about a dozen of us in the room, drinking beer before the open fire and listening to Benny Goodman records, when two of the boys began to dance with each other, an act which struck me as highly offensive, the more so as I did not recall ever having seen them before. I asked who they were, but no one seemed to know. I concluded that they had simply seen us walking home with the beer and had mingled in with the crowd. They had stopped dancing now, and sat on the sofa across the room.

Suddenly I began to rock with laughter at a terribly funny idea. I whispered it to a friend on my left.

"Go ahead," he laughed. "I dare you."

"It's all up to him," I pointed out in a sort of smothered chuckle. "It won't be my decision. He's got a fifty-fifty chance. Absolutely fair."

Hypnotically the schism suddenly became complete. I was entirely the spectator of a certain Peter Putnam, whose actions were all in the third person. I watched him walk across the room to the two boys. I watched him holding one finger behind his back. I felt him lean toward the one sitting on the arm of the sofa. I heard the words of his question.

"Odd or even?"

The boy's face turned, smiling back, and the lips moved.

"Even," they said. Too bad. There was only one finger behind his back, and one was an odd number. I felt the finger tuck into a fist, felt the swing and the pivot, the stiffening of the wrist, elbow and shoulder, the sharp contact of the knuckles on the chin, and then I knew that they were my knuckles on his chin, and I knew what I had done.

After that, all the clarity was blurred into confusion. The boy went over backward and scrambled out into the hall. His friend followed to see if he was all right, and everybody in the room jumped up. I do not think I even had a chance to apologize, and there was no retribution. I wanted it, but there was none forthcoming. Three times Gordy Bent held his hand behind his back, and I guessed odd or even, but every time I guessed right. Then we gave it up and I went to bed.

The next day I discovered the boy's name, bought a bottle of whisky as a peace offering and looked up his room. The door was locked, and a neighbor told me that he had gone to Philadelphia to see the dentist about some loose bridgework. And so I was denied even the relief of apology.

I took the whisky back to our room. There was no one there. It was about four o'clock, the time of day when the bright hard sunlight slants in through the windows, quite motionless, like yellow bars holding the sun in its place and refusing to give way to the softness of twilight. I sat down, pulled open a table drawer and took out ■ .22-caliber revolver, which had been left there by a friend.

I spun the cylinder idly. The thing that had happened last night, I thought, would not have happened if I had never read John O'Hara's Appointment in Samarra. The lines between literary and living reality had ceased to exist, and O'Hara had replaced Fitzgerald. Last night I had not been Peter Putnam. I had not even been Amory Blaine. I had been Julian English. And Julian English had committed suicide. I took a bullet from the drawer and inserted it in the revolver. I spun the cylinder over and over again, watching to see where the loaded chamber came to rest. I had heard that the force of gravity always tended to carry the weighted chamber to the bottom away from the firing pin. Watching now, I could not be sure. I removed the bullet and put the muzzle to my temple. I pulled the trigger. The click sounded very loud in the silent room. I replaced the bullet and spun the cylinder, closing my eyes to make sure I did not cheat. I squeezed the trigger. There was the same click and I felt the same as when the gun had been empty. I spun the cylinder again and squeezed. Click. By squeezing, now, without spinning he cylinder, I could reduce the chances from one in eight to one in four. Looking straight ahead, I pulled the trigger. Click. That was enough. I brought the gun down and unloaded it. Three chances last night, and no retribution. Three chances this afternoon, and no retribution. There was no retribution anywhere. I took the bottle of whisky out of the paper bag and poured myself a drink.

During the weeks which followed, I stopped eating at the Cottage Club, preferring to take my meals uptown or to bring back sandwiches from the delicatessen. I stopped drinking, and I stopped smoking. I walked and ran miles every afternoon for physical exercise, and I went to bed early. The futility of my health program was demonstrated when I fell ill. After several days in the infirmary, a blood test revealed that I was suffering from infectious mononucleosis, a blood disease about which relatively little was known at that time. I was hopelessly enervated and found it an unbearable drain to read even the light novels of the infirmary library.

I was still in the infirmary when spring vacation arrived. Doctor York suggested that I might complete my convalescence at home, so my mother brought the car down to drive me back to Litchfield. I was confined to my bed at first, but when my strength returned I took to working around the place again, spending whole days in removing rocks from the barren stretch of mud intended for a lawn. At night we read aloud or listened to phonograph records. I liked the records the best, and the conversation least, because I did not know how to talk about the only thing that really touched me. I was finding it more and more tiring to assume the pose of the confident young college boy, which was the only social role I knew how to play. When I took the train back to Princeton, I was unrelieved by any confession of the nameless fear which haunted every waking and sleeping moment.

I found the courage to go back only because I was too cowardly to do anything else, and in that state of cowardice everything took courage. It took so much courage to go to classes that I seldom braved it. The only thing which did not take courage was going to bed, and I sought refuge in a great deal of sleep, but true sleep would not come. I simply lay in bed trying to lull the stabbing pain of consciousness into a sort of catatonic trance. I was later to discover that I was suffering from a recurrence of mononucleosis.

On the last Wednesday in April before the weekend of house parties, I boarded the train for Litchfield. In the change pocket of my coat I carried three .22-caliber bullets, and folded in my wallet a neatly typed suicide note to my parents. The bullets I had been carrying ever since the afternoon of the Russian roulette, and for almost three months I had been changing them from coat to coat as methodically as one might change his cigarettes or lighter. The note I had written two weeks before as a sort of exercise in articulating the nature of my own despair.

Yet I had no fixed intention as to suicide. If I had planned it, I should have stayed in Princeton for house parties. I should have given myself one last fling to savor the sensuous excitement of the girls, the music, the spring and my own youth, and, having done so, I believe I should not have gone through with the attempt. I told my parents simply that I had wanted to come home for a long weekend.

It is difficult to characterize the time that followed as anything other than a sort of dogged waiting period. My clearest recollection is of wandering through the fields and hills and along the rushing brook. It seemed to me that my eyes had never seen with such a stinging clarity. I saw the new fullness of the pliant young leaves, just darkening into green. I saw the rich deep chocolate of the stream banks, still sheathed, in the shady places, with the flashing tints of icicles hanging from the rocky eaves. I saw the tiny droplets splashing over shining stones, half buried in the bubbling flow which sparkled in the sunlight reflected into everything from the blue dome of the sky. Each leaf and twig, each play of light and shadow ought to have filled me with the living beauty of the spring, but I felt no more aesthetic inspiration than does the camera film which chemically reacts to rays of light admitted through the snapping of the shutter; like the camera, I was empty.

I lingered on like that for days, but something had to give, and, on the night of Saturday, May 3, 1941, it happened. There was nothing dramatic, no crisis of word or thought or deed. It was much simpler than that. The last thing I can remember seeing was a purple leather traveling clock, whose hands stood at twenty minutes past ten. It was more than an hour later when I did it, but I cannot remember doing it, and, anyway, that was the real end. I had been sliding and sliding for three years, and that was the moment I slid off the edge.

It was about an hour later when my parents heard me call for help. My father found me on my hands and knees beside the bathroom door bleeding from a wound in my right temple. Across the room on the floor beside the bed lay the .22-caliber rifle with which I had done it. A few minutes later, Doctor Warner arrived, and as soon as he had stopped the bleeding I was taken to the Charlotte Hungerford Hospital in Torrington, two miles away.

For some time, my life hung in the balance. I can remember nothing of the outside world until ten days after "the accident."

Whatever my thoughts, as I drifted through that ten-day sleep, when I woke I could not put them into words. I knew that I had been in a dark place, and that that place was somewhere deep inside me. I knew that I had been afraid, but was afraid no longer. Half dead, I was more alive than I had ever been. Perhaps I was fully alive for the first time.

I was in a hospital. I could not see. My head ached interminably. Occasionally I heard footsteps padding about the room or the rustling of a starched dress beside my bed. I was given pills to take with water through a bent glass tube. I can remember the sound of my own tired voice, and even this seemed hardly to be my own. My sole desire was for sleep.

Gradually, as my conscious mind regained its strength, day separated from night, morning from afternoon, and the sequence of the hours took on definition from the unchanging pattern of hospital routine. I awoke each morning to the clatter of metal, china and glassware in the kitchen. I lay for a while without moving, trying to remember where I was, and why I was there. I stirred a little.

"Good morning." It was the night nurse.

"Good morning," I said.

"Would you like to wash up?"

When she brought me a basin and toothbrush, I washed slowly, brushing my teeth gingerly, so as not to shake my aching head. When I had finished, I asked to have my bed rolled down to doze until it was time for breakfast. Mrs. Monroe had replaced the night nurse when my tray was brought in. She helped me with breakfast, handing me the fruit juice, salting my soft-boiled egg, putting cream and sugar into my coffee. Eating was clumsy and I had little appetite. Unseen food was somehow rather tasteless, but I ate with determined concentration, if only to nourish the life for which I was now so eager. Afterward I lay back exhausted.

That was the way it went all through the day. The trivialities of hospital routine absorbed nearly the whole of my conscious energies. In my physical weakness I found these efforts tiring, but not tiresome, because they were the means of expressing a boundless new ambition. I took naïve delight in mastering the simplest skills. My first shave was a monumental challenge. The relative dexterity with which I changed the blade filled me with pride, but on lathering up I was disconcerted to find that I had got the lower edge of the bandages over my eyes wet and soapy. The razoring went on endlessly, and by the time I had worked around to the left side of my face my arms were numb with fatigue. The exertion drained me utterly, but although later I discovered patches of stubble in the hollows of my cheeks and around the corners of my mouth, they did not spoil my triumph.

Shortly after my bed bath, Doctor Warner dropped by on his hospital rounds. Doctor Scoville, a "brain man," and Doctor Unsworth, an "eye man," came over periodically from Hartford, so that Doctor Warner's visit was largely routine. Its importance to me was that it was he who had saved my life, and each time he came I was determined to thank him for it; but his air was so unfailingly jovial as he inquired into my health, changed my dressings and took my blood pressure that I never found the proper moment. The best I could do was to make an outward show of gaiety as a sign that I no longer despaired of the life he had saved.

There was something of the same reticence in my relations with my family. Except on weekends, when my father was home from Hartford, or more distant relatives might be staying at the farm, the daytime visits were confined to my mother and my sister, Bimbi. Her husband was then stationed at West Point, but after the "accident" she had brought her children to the farm in Litchfield. Once, I remember, she brought along her two-year-old daughter, Lynn, and perhaps I still recall that day so well because Lynn's reactions had an underlying significance for me. Bimbi had placed her on the bed beside me, so that I could feel how she had grown, but she was frightened by the sight of the bandages which covered my eyes and burst into piercing cries. During the preceding summer I had often bathed and changed her, but now I had become a total stranger to her. Far more painful was the thought that I had become something of a stranger to my mother and sister as well.

During ten days of ageless isolation, I had discovered the existence of a new self. I was still uncertain of the exact nature of this self, so, although I had returned to them now, I felt—and I am sure they felt—that the introduction of this stranger into the old family pattern had to be approached warily.

Two or three times we had attempted to discuss the suicide, but I knew my explanations had been hopelessly inadequate. Granted the premise that life was utterly useless, it was simple and logical, but how could I explain the premise? I could only assure my parents that the responsibility was entirely my own. I could only insist on the equally inexplicable fact that the premise had miraculously altered. Somehow my family found the strength, the courage and the understanding not to press me, to accept it as a mystery. It was "the accident," a thing with consequences but without causes, and having found a name for it, we left "the accident" alone.

I reported how I had slept, or what Doctor Warner had said, and they brought me news of the farm. The apple orchard was being sprayed, or Brownie, my sister's five-year-old son, had spent the morning hopefully fishing with a safety pin and a length of twine.

My strength was still unequal to any sustained activity, and even the conversation of these morning calls was tiring. When my mother and sister had gone, I lay back wearily. The effort of eating lunch increased my lassitude, and soon afterward I drowsed off. Sleep was blessed isolation, but when I awoke again, the respite seemed only to have heightened my sensitivity to minor physical discomforts. My eyes were hot and teary under the layers of gauze bandages. I wanted to tear off the wrappings and sink my face into a basin of clear cold water. But the greatest source of my discomfort was psychological in its impact.

During sleep, or in the restful lull of daydreams, there were always pictures before my eyes. These were so perfect in shading, color and detail that they might have been photographed or painted. They came to me entirely spontaneously, and it was quite impossible to conjure them up by any act of will. Now, as I awoke from my dreams, they disappeared. I saw not the even, opaque darkness I had imagined as the "vision" of the blind, but two luminous globes of light, like the nebulous glare of street lights in a dense midnight fog. They floated there, a little off to one side, shifting unsteadily with the movements of my head and eyeballs. I found their ugly wavering glare a torment and I lay there in perspiring discontentment. It was not until the nurse had helped me wash up and straightened my sheets that I became fully awake and able to forget the floating street lamps in the mist.

Two or three afternoons a week Doctor Unsworth came over from Hartford to examine my eyes. When he had cut away the bandages he carefully washed off the discharge accumulated on the lashes. Although my lids were very sensitive, it was good to have them bathed, but I always felt queer in the moment of stillness that followed. It was too early to test my vision. My lids had been sewn together as a safeguard against the pressure behind my eyeballs and it would be some time before I could expect even a tentative prediction. The great unanswered question hung between us like a massive velvet curtain.

He had told me that the eyes themselves seemed to have escaped critical injury and that the most serious question concerned the extent of damage to the optic nerves. Once he cited the case of a man who had attempted suicide with a .45 automatic and who had recovered so completely that with the aid of glasses he had afterward worked as a draftsman. Later I felt a bound of hope in a personal experience. Toward the end of my stay in the hospital I was wheeled on a bed to the sun roof and, despite the heavy layers of bandages and the black sunshade which protected my eyes, I felt twin stabbing pains as I emerged into the brightness of the glare. But the balls of light and the draftsman with glasses and the stabbing pains were only the occasions for my optimism. Its source lay much deeper.

What was blindness or eyesight beside the miracle of my new-found invulnerability? I had been through hell. I had watched the spectacle of my own personality dissipating into a vacuum. I had been hurt all there was for me to be hurt and, behold, I was unhurt. I was not simply unhurt; I was more whole than I had dreamed was possible.

Except for the visits and letters from my family, there was nothing in the world of the hospital to call up associations with the past. I lived in a room I had never seen, according to an artificial regimen sterile of all memories. Perhaps it was for this reason that the return to even so new a home as the Litchfield farm made such a deep impression.

On the June morning of the great day two stretcher-bearers lifted me into their canvas-and-aluminum cradle. Thoroughly tucked round with blankets, I was wheeled down the hall, into the elevator, out into the parking area where an ambulance was waiting. It was all like a dream in slow motion. When at last we arrived and the grunting stretcher-bearers had hoisted me up the narrow stairway to lay me in my bed, I could feel myself sinking into the familiarity of my surroundings like a migratory bird gliding to rest on the surface of a well-known lake.

With the exception of the rented hospital bed, everything around me belonged to the time before the accident. Lunch was served with china and silver whose pattern and design I could remember, the tray was placed on a home hospital table dating from an illness of my mother's years before. I could recall the furniture, the wallpaper, the position of the windows and the trees and hills beyond them.

With my family near at hand I no longer needed nurses the clock around. Mrs. Hemmerle took over the night shift, and because she left at six and Mrs. Monroe did not arrive until midmorning, my day began in refreshing solitude. My mother or sister brought me a toothbrush and a basin of water to wash in. I enjoyed eating breakfast alone without the consciousness of being watched. There was no embarrassment if I should happen to put my finger in the marmalade, and I passed my hands over the tray in exploration, learning to move them slowly and keep them low, so as not to tip over the glasses.

My parents had a young couple working for them that summer. Gladys, who cooked and cleaned, brought up the tray, but Wilson, whose real work was outside, always came to carry it down again. My father having left for Hartford, Wilson was the only remaining member of the household sufficiently familiar with the jargon of the sports page to read me the baseball and boxing news. This duty he performed with conscientious pleasure. He would read me about the Giants' game and Joe DiMaggio's hitting streak, or Billy Conn's chances against Joe Louis, and then we would talk for a while. After weeks of twenty-four-hour feminine surveillance, it was refreshing to talk alone to a man again, and I found myself responding to his reminiscences and anecdotes with a flood of my own.

With the arrival of Mrs. Monroe, it was time for my bed bath and shave. Afterward, unless the day was cloudy, Wilson returned to carry me down the stairs and out onto the lawn for a sun bath. Sometimes my mother or sister read to me. Sometimes Mrs. Monroe came down to do the crossword puzzle aloud. And sometimes I simply lay there alone, feeling the warmth of the sun and listening to the insect sounds in the grass.

I recall one morning when I was joined on my blanket by my five-year-old nephew, Brownie.

"You know?" he volunteered. "When I get big, I'm going to get my eyes fixed too."

The unexpectedness of this announcement made me laugh, but it was revealing. Until then it had not occurred to me that my bandaged eyes would have to be explained to Brownie. So far as I had given any thought to the possibility of permanent blindness, I had considered it purely my own problem. It was I who had created it, and I alone would bear its consequences. Now I realized with a pang that whatever the character of the new life I was beginning, it was inextricably linked to the loving and long-established relationships of the family.

Shortly after my return to a freshly made bed, Doctor Warner stopped by. We exchanged a few pleasantries while he took my blood pressure, and he went his way. After a good lunch I was glad to settle down to the afternoon nap which was becoming my best sleep of the day. By the time I had awakened from it Mrs. Monroe was almost ready to go. When she was gone I called to my sister. The radio-phonograph had been moved up from the living room, and my father had brought back my old records from Princeton. Now I asked to have a stack of these placed on the changer, and although I had many classical records, it was nearly always the popular tunes that I preferred.

I recall the day my mother interrupted my dreaming by bringing in my typewriter. Would I like to try it? I said I would. As she placed the typewriter on the hospital table across my lap, I tried to visualize the keyboard. Then, carefully, I rolled in a piece of typing paper and felt for the position of the keys with my fingers. "The quick red gox jumps over the lazy brown dof," I wrote. My fingers felt stiff and wooden. "Now is the time gor all food men to come to the aid og the party."

"I think you're getting your f's and g's mixed up," my mother said. "Would you like me to show you where they are?"

"Oh," I said. "No, I can fix that all right. They're both under my left forefinger—I'll show you." My left forefinger, I wrote. "See?"

"Perfect!" my mother said. I wrote my own name, and then the names of the members of my family. Then I stopped.

"Is the typewriter working all right?" my mother asked.

"Fine; but I just can't think of anything to write."

"Why don't you write your grandfather a letter? He'd love it"; and when I did not answer, "Or would that be too hard?"

Merely to overcome the bouncing of the table and the weakness of my fingers would have been hard, but the attempt to fix the drift of my mind for the writing of a letter would have been impossible. I had discovered that I could type. For the present that was all I wanted.

"This will sound silly," I said, "but I'm kind of tired. Maybe I'll wait until I can sit at a real desk."

The house burst into new life with the return of my father from Hartford. The sound of the car wheels spinning down the dirt-and-rock-filled surface of the road could be heard a quarter of a mile away. A minute or so later, the screen door slammed and he called hello, as my mother hurried to greet him. Two shrieks of delight from Brownie and Lynn told me that he was giving chase in their nightly roughhouse, but a moment later he was upstairs, walking between my room and his through the connecting bath, stripping off his uniform and telling me the baseball scores he had heard on the car radio.

"As soon as I finish my bath," he said above the roar of the running water, "I want to figure out a sneering telegram to send to Bob Deering. Today is his fortieth birthday and I beat him in both badminton games." He laughed. "We've been playing every day at the Y for over a year now and this was our seven hundredth game."

"What's the score?" I asked.

"That's the beauty of it! We were tied yesterday but now I'm two up on him. I want to kid him about it in the telegram."

His delight was contagious and I was tickled by it as I listened to the splash of his bathing. When he had changed to civilian clothes, he went downstairs, returning a few minutes later with the cocktail tray. He poured Martinis for my mother and sister, handed me a can of beer, and turned on the radio to listen to Lowell Thomas. This was a nightly ritual, but as soon as the news was over my father interrupted.

"I want to frame that telegram to Bob Deering," he said, "and I'd like some help. Anybody got any ideas?"

"What's the general gist?" my sister asked.

"Well, I've got a starter. How's this? 'For athletes who are pseudo-sporty, life does not begin at forty.'"

"That's a good beginning," my mother said. "How can we finish it off?"

We thought in silence for a minute and then I offered a suggestion: "How about,

It is a general rule of life that should you touch mud with your gloves, it is never the mud that becomes glovey.

New information to help you nourish your cat better

High Quality Proteins Abound in Fish Fillets

Puss 'n Boots retains these costly portions

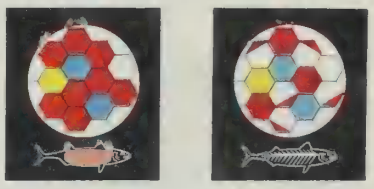
Puss 'n Boots Cat Food is made from whole fish, not from by-products. Here's what this means to your cat's welfare:

The Mystery of Life

Your cat's body consists of billions of microscopic cells, which nature constantly rebuilds. The "building materials" are the proteins in a cat's diet. But the quality of those proteins is all important.

Fish is unusually rich in proteins, but the high quality proteins are concentrated in the fillets... the tasty parts usually sold for human consumption, but retained in Puss 'n Boots.

What Are Proteins?



A protein molecule is made up of tiny "building blocks" called amino acids. There are many different amino acids but at least 8 of them are essential. Unless the protein contains all 8 of these amino acids, it is of poor quality.

A high quality protein must:

1. Contain adequate quantities of all the essential amino acids in proper proportion for the constant rebuilding of tissue and muscle.

2. Be easily "broken down" in the digestive system, so that it passes quickly into the blood stream and so into nature's "rebuilding operation".

Puss 'n Boots retains the fish fillets to give your cat the high quality proteins it needs for a sturdy, active body.

The Difference in Proteins—Diagrammed

HIGH QUALITY Proteins from fish fillets show a full count of essential amino acids (red blocks). Every essential amino acid is there in sufficient quantity. Other colors represent less important amino acids.

LOW QUALITY Proteins, from the mere fish "frames," lack the full count of essential amino acids (red blocks). Part-empty blocks indicate essential amino acids that are wholly or partly missing.

Plus Vitamins from Fish Livers ... and Selected Cereals, Too.

Besides high quality proteins, your cat also needs vitamins. Puss 'n Boots supplies these, too, by processing the whole fish, including the vitamin-rich fish livers.

Selected cereals are added for all-round nutrition. And there's extra Vitamin B_1, the essential "nerve vitamin," in every can. Puss 'n Boots thus provides every nutrient a cat is known to need.

'Congratulations! As for me, badminton's fine at fifty-three.'"

They all laughed. My father called Western Union. We could hear him chuckling as he gave the message to the operator. And I smiled, joining in the ripple of amusement that flowed between my mother and sister.

"Have a cheese and cracker?" my mother asked.

"I can't," Bimbi said. "I'm dieting."

"Goodness!" my mother said. "I wish you all wouldn't be so ascetic. You're always giving up things. Papa goes on the wagon. Peter stops smoking, and now you stop eating. I'm the only one without any will power."

"I haven't got any will power," Bimbi said. "Just a flabby stomach."

"My stomach's the only part of me that isn't flabby," I said. "It's got iron muscles from sitting up in bed, but the rest of me is like jelly. I wonder how much weight I've lost since the accident."

"Mamma's lost twenty pounds," Bimbi said in a clear, steady voice that carried its message, as it was intended to do.

"Have you, mamma? That's awful."

"Oh, nonsense, children. I feel fine. I always feel better when I've lost a little weight."

The surface triviality of our family conversation could give no idea of its deeper levels of communication. There were subterranean channels of sympathy and understanding, and with each succeeding evening I could feel the deeper currents from the common reservoir flowing more freely. After dinner, when the family came back upstairs, we often abandoned conversation in favor of reading aloud. This seemed no special concession to my blindness, because it had long been a family custom. The evening slipped by quickly and by ten o'clock, when Mrs. Hemmerle arrived, I was ready for sleep.

My days in bed were long and slow, and in memory they form a single blur from which one lone day stands apart. It is marked on the calendar as June 11, 1941, but in my life it was the day I turned twenty-one.

Today I am a man, I thought as I awoke. I clearly recall both the thought and the irony which prompted me to smile as I thought it. Yet it lingered in the background of my mind throughout the routine of the morning. Today I was a man, but I ate my breakfast, heard the sports news, talked to Wilson, bathed and shaved as on other days.

"Many happy returns of the day," my mother said as she came into my room. She placed a box in my lap. "I'm cheating a little," she said, "but I thought I'd give you these now. It might be fun to wear them and look a little snappier for the Bescherung."

Bescherung was one of several dozen German words we had incorporated into our vocabulary. It meant the ceremony of giving presents and its use symbolized the special importance attached to the observance of family ritual. To give a present before the appointed hour was a distinct breach of protocol and we both warmed to the taste of forbidden fruit as I opened the box. It held a pair of silk pajamas and a bathrobe which I said would make me feel like Charles Boyer.

Of all the men I have known, I cannot recall one whose mother did her level best for him when he was little who did not turn out well when he grew up.

FRANCES PARKINSON KEYES

She half dismissed my thanks to outline the plans for the day. Goppy (my grandfather) was driving up with Uncle Ebe and Aunt Julie to spend the night. They would arrive about 4:30.

Goppy had not seen me since the accident. How had he reacted to it? What would he think of me now? The questions had more than ordinary significance. My grandfather had played a dominant role in our family and the bond between us had been unusually strong. Later as I lay sunning on my blanket whole scenes from our life together flashed before my eyes.

My most vivid impressions of Goppy belonged in settings so familiar that distinctions of time were blurred. There was, for example, my grandfather's bedroom in his house at 335 Riverside Drive.

My grandmother died in the spring of 1928 and that fall we moved to 335. It was a spacious five-story house, but there were only four bedrooms, and I shared one with Goppy. I could vividly recall how it had looked on the countless mornings I had awakened in it.

There were two large windows on the drive. When my grandfather, wearing a white nightshirt and green toweling slippers, had pulled back the curtains, we stood for a moment, each at his window, to gaze at the beauty of the morning. The Hudson spread its broad surface for a mile to the sheer rock cliffs of the palisades, rising through an atmosphere so miraculously clear that the very branches of the trees which crowned them seemed to wink at us, and even the docks and the warehouses and the signs, washed clean in the morning light, seemed to belong there by design as man-made contributions intended to heighten, by contrast, the beauty of the face of Nature.

Our rising proceeded according to custom. Until late in his seventies, Goppy performed setting-up exercises on the floor before the fireplace. While he washed and shaved in the bathroom, I followed his example. Once a week Goppy weighed first himself and then me on the old-fashioned standing scales in the bathroom and marked the figures on a chart. Even long afterward, when the figures opposite my name had risen above 170, he never omitted upon my return visits to include me in this weekly ritual.

A new series of scenes materialized and in these, too, place seemed to have arrested the changing flow of time. My brother and I were sitting with Goppy in his black Buick limousine, driving through the Greenpoint section of Brooklyn. We felt a bound of recognition when the car swerved to a stop before a buff-painted brick building. Above a door that looked very small and plain hung a black wooden sign. In gold block letters upon a black background were the words, EBERHARD FABER PENCIL COMPANY.

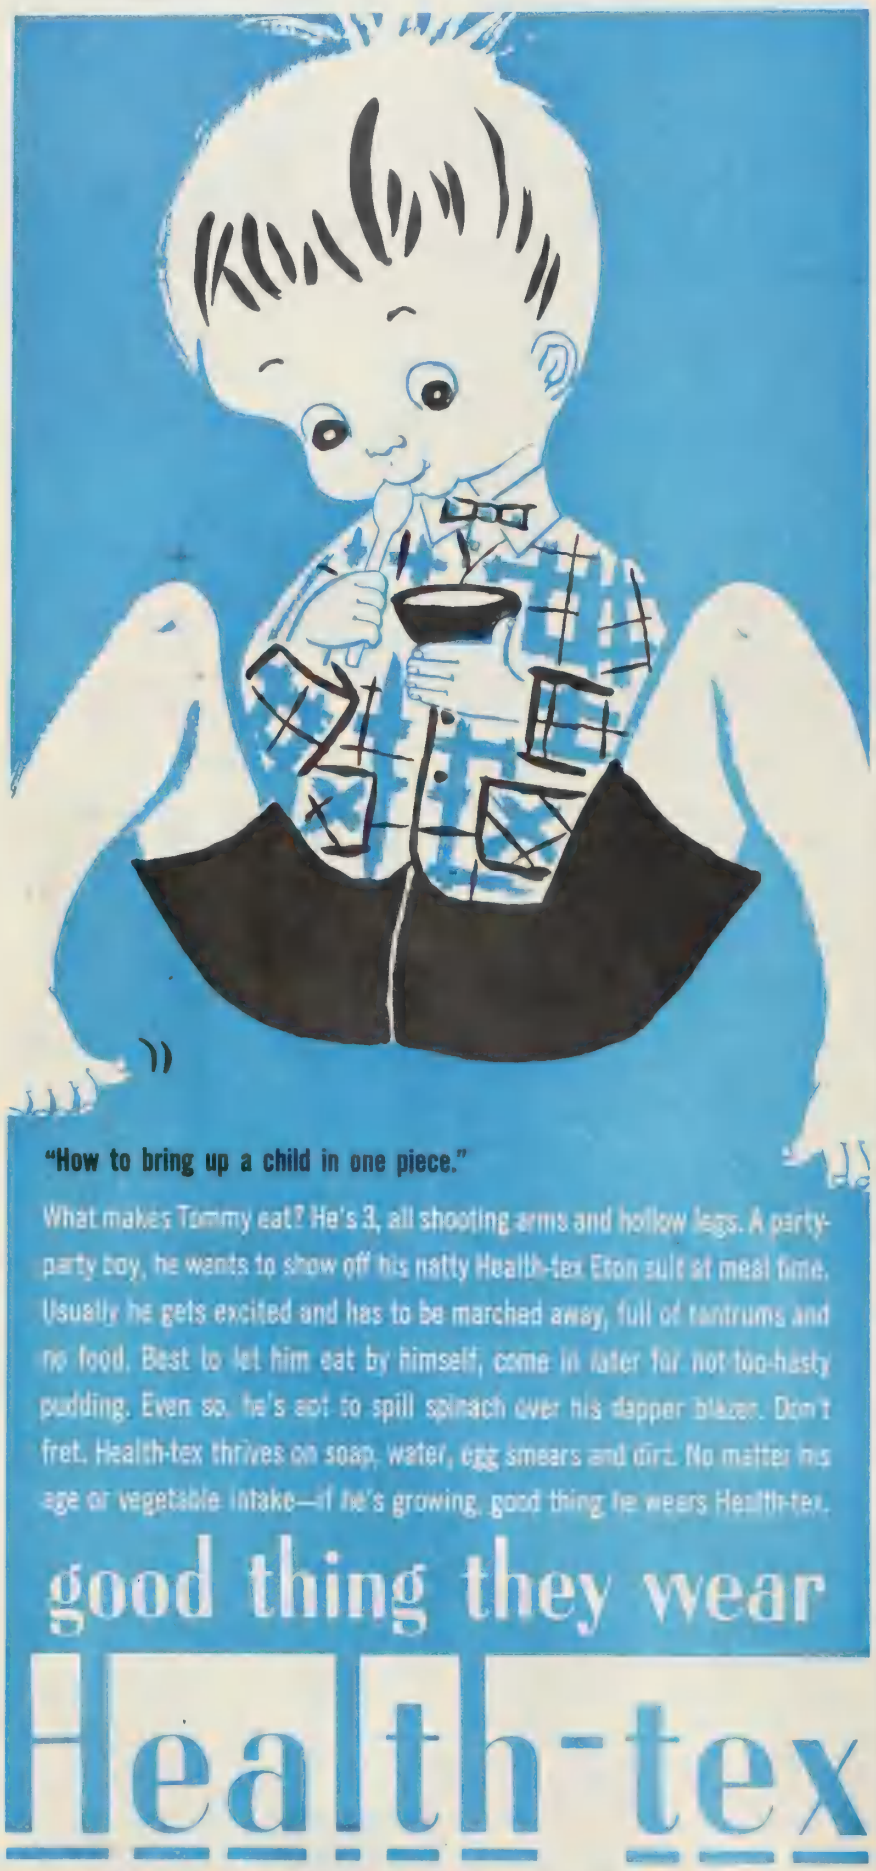
Inside, a switchboard operator looked up from a panel whose yellow bulb glowed faintly against the hard squares of outdoor light behind her.

"Good morning, Mr. Faber."

My grandfather smiled, touched the brim of his hat with a rolled-up newspaper, and turned through a door to the left. His light buoyant step had the air of a friendly, dignified and confident advance, which we followed down a corridor, up a dimly lit wooden staircase, and into his own corner room. Here we hung our coats upon the old mahogany hat tree, and while he changed into a neat black alpaca jacket we stared about the familiar surroundings.

Everything was roomy, old-fashioned, and alive with the past. When my grandfather had seated himself in a wooden chair with a black leather cushion, Mr. Huber, whom Lo and I knew as Uncle Fred, came in with the morning mail.

"So your Goppy is going to show you how to make pencils?" he beamed at us. "Well, make yourselves at home. I won't keep him very long."



While they talked we sat at desks, rolling the tops up and down, opening and shutting the drawers, or staring down into the street where Fantl, the chauffeur, sat in the Buick, reading the Daily News. Later, as Goppy, who had somehow become Lothar W. Faber, studied the morning mail through his horn-rimmed pince-nez, we wandered quietly around the room, examining the mementos of his business and family life. On a row of glass-fronted bookcases, packed with gray ledgers, stood a polished wooden chest with tiny drawers, filled with samples of pencils. There were photographs too. One showed the A. W. Faber pencil factory in Germany, the largest in the world. Near it hung a bronze relief medallion of our great-grandfather, Eberhard. He had come to America in 1848 as the representative of A. W. Faber, but a year later had founded his own company. On another wall there was a recent photograph of our grandfather's older brother, Uncle John, his partner for half a century. The facts and, especially, the antiquity of the firm were impressive to our youth, but both the history and the photographs were old hat to us and we were glad to have Uncle Fred take us to the display counter in the outer room where he told us funny stories and showed us samples which we pretended not to know Goppy would offer us before we went home.

The screen door of the house banged and Wilson's voice floated over the lawn: "Had enough sun, Pete? It's almost time for lunch."

It was good to be back in the present. Upstairs the sheets felt cool and pleasant in contrast to the hot blanket. I ate my lunch slowly and lay back for my afternoon nap. When I awoke again an undetermined time later there was the sound of footsteps moving around my room.

"Howdy, bub." It was my sister. "You've really been pounding your ear. Mamma's in Torrington doing a few last-minute errands and I wanted to straighten up your room before Goppy arrives. I thought maybe you'd like to be awake when he gets here."

We were doing the crossword puzzle a short time later when I heard the sound of wheels on the road and asked if it was the Fabers.

Bimbi stood up to look out the window. "Oh, my goodness! Pete, I'll have to go downstairs for a minute."

"Is it the Fabers?" I asked again.

"No. Something else."

She laughed a short, mysterious, delighted laugh, and hurried out the door. For the first time that day I really began to look forward to the idea of the party and the excitement of unwrapping presents.

"In here," I could hear Bimbi saying in the hall, "and up against that wall would be the best, I guess."

"O.K., ma'am," a man's voice answered. "Easy there, Joe."

I tried to guess what it could be they were carrying, but I was interrupted by the honking arrival of what sounded like two cars at once. Hearing my sister's "Hi" as she went out to greet them, I knew it must be the Fabers.

"Where's the birthday boy?" My grandfather's voice carried clearly from the hall.

"He's upstairs, but I'm not sure he's awake yet." It was my mother. "How was the trip?"

Their voices faded as they went into the living room, but were followed by others.

"Where do you want me to put this binocular-shaped package, Julie?" That was Uncle Ebe.

"Just leave it there in the hall. I don't know where they'll be having the Bescherung."

How benevolent, well-knit and good-humored they all sounded! My sense of anticipation grew, and I longed to greet them. At last I heard my mother emerging into the hall.

"Right up this way," she was saying. "He's in the front room."

I straightened my sheets, sat up and turned my head toward the door.

"So here you are, old socks!" my grandfather called jovially. "Well, how are you?" He came over to the bed and kissed me. "You look fine."

"Pietro, Pietro!" Aunt Julie embraced me. "It's good to see you out of the hospital. Many, many happy returns of the day!"

When they had settled themselves I asked where Uncle Ebe was.

"Gone for a walk! You know that restless creature!" She laughed, then added, "But he was dying to look at the brook and we didn't all want to crowd in on you at once."

"You two entertain Peter," my mother said. "Brock ought to be home any minute, and I want to put the finishing touches on the birthday table."

"I'll help you, Mollie, and leave the two ex-roommates to talk over old times." Julie rose and followed my mother, who was still protesting that there was no need for her to help. And that was how we came to be alone in the moment I had been dreading.

"How was the trip up? Did you find the way all right?"

"Perfectly. Ebe drove, but Julie did the pathfinding. I don't think that chauffeur of mine could ever have got me here." This was less a slight upon his chauffeur than a comment upon the absurd remoteness of Litchfield from New York. My grandfather loved travel, but there was only one place to live. The appearance of this old foible made me feel more at home, and I did not have to force a smile.

"It's a pretty drive this time of the year."

"Yes, lovely. And there's a beautiful view from this window." I pictured him gazing out at the orchard. "Well, how are you feeling, old socks?"

"Fine!" I said. "Doctor Scoville came yesterday, and said I could come downstairs for the Bescherung."

"That's bully!" There was a pause, and then, "Well, well well! What have we here? Brownie!" The real warmth and gaiety under the mock surprise confirmed my suspicion that the gusto of a moment before had been a little forced.

"Hi, Goppy!" Brownie screamed delightedly as he ran across the room.

"I'm sorry he interrupted you," Bimbi apologized from the door, "but he just couldn't wait to see you."

"Where's your little sister?" Goppy asked.

"Taking a bath."

"She'll be down later," Bimbi explained. "You've got to take a bath, too, Brownie. I'll call you in just five minutes." Her footsteps retreated into the hall.

"Did you bring me any pencils, Goppy?"

"Sugar!" Goppy said, and I could picture him clapping his hand to his forehead. "I forgot! I left all my pencils in Greenpoint."

"Someday, Brownie," I said, "maybe Goppy will take you to his factory and show you how the pencils are made. He's old enough for that now, don't you think?"

"You bet he is! When your Uncle Peter was your age, I used to take him with me and show him how we make the pencils and put the leads inside and paint them all sorts of beautiful colors. You know, you remind me very much of your Uncle Peter when he was your age. He was very cute."

"Which was cuter, him or me?"

"I don't know." My grandfather weighed the problem carefully for a moment. "But I think you're cuter now. I like little suckers I can hold on my lap. I think he's too big to hold on my lap, don't you?"

"Yes, yes." Brownie was convulsed.

"I'll show you a trick," Goppy began. "See? Here's my watch. Blow on it."

Among the earliest memories of any of his grandchildren was that of blowing on his gold hunting-case watch to open it. Even after we had learned about the spring beneath the winding stem, the magic had never quite disappeared. Now Brownie was properly delighted and mystified.

"Take it over to your Uncle Peter and see if he can do it. Careful, now."

I put out my hand, and Brownie placed the watch into my palm. I blew and opened it.

"See?" I said, smiling at Brownie.

"Feel the face with your finger, Peter."

I placed the tip of my forefinger against the dial. "The crystal's gone," I said. "Did you break it?"

"Can you tell what time it is?"

I touched the delicate hands cautiously. The stem, I recalled, was next to the number 3.

"Ten minutes of five," I guessed, feeling suddenly shy.

"Right." Goppy's voice was triumphant.

I laughed. I was pleased that I had guessed correctly, that the game had worked.

"Here, Brownie," I said. "Take the watch back to Goppy."

"No," Goppy said. "That's yours. Keep it. It's your birthday present."

Minutes later, after Brownie had been called for his bath and my grandfather had gone downstairs, I still sat there, holding the heavy watch in my hand.

How characteristically he had presented it! We had all learned early, as Brownie would learn, never to ask our grandfather if he had brought us presents when he paid us a visit. Sometime after his arrival, as we sat in his room, watching him unpack, he would pause to show us something which he said he had just bought for himself. No matter how improbable the purchase might seem—a wallet, a box of colored pencils, even a set of toy soldiers—we could never doubt his gravity as he expanded upon its virtues. Then, suddenly, he would announce, "If you really like it, you can have it. Keep it. That's a present from me to you."

But the watch! Uncle John had given it to him nearly sixty years ago on his twenty-first birthday and now he had given it to me. I tried to think of all the physical articles that I associated with my grandfather and none of them seemed nearly so fitting a symbol of his character as this watch, simple, precious, dignified, the plaything of his grandchildren and the timepiece by which he regulated his orderly, useful, constructive life.

The Bescherung lay just ahead. I washed and changed and by the time my father had carried me downstairs I was quite in the spirit of the occasion. They all sang "Happy birthday" and Bimbi laughingly aimed my head at the lighted candles. Feeling self-conscious because I knew that we were all wishing the same thing, I blew. By some miracle I managed to get all the candles in one long puff. Everyone applauded.

"Feel what the cake is sitting on," my sister said. "I can't wait."

It was a beautiful kneehole desk from my parents and I admired it enthusiastically, opening and shutting the drawers, feeling the leather top, and testing the height for typing.

The mood was pretty much the same as on all the birthdays in those days, but here and there a passing incident was a reminder that there had been an alteration.

"This is a terribly inappropriate present at the moment," Aunt Julie said, handing me a package, "but I thought I'd give it to you anyway."

It was a collection of reproductions of paintings and architectural drawings which she had picked up at an auction. She knew I was studying the subject in college. "There are a couple of water-color copies of Tiepolo ceilings I thought would be quite nice framed."

I told her it was a wonderful present, and it was. It was much more than a present. It implied that my blindness was only temporary, that my interest and appreciation of Renaissance art and architecture did not depend on the ability to see it. It expressed her belief, the whole family's belief, that I was bigger than my blindness and I was immensely grateful.

The binocular-shaped package proved to be a couple of bottles of champagne. Just before dinner they were opened and I took a sip for good luck. Then my father and uncle made a chair of their hands and carried me up to bed while my sister followed with a tray.

I ate alone, but afterward the others took turns visiting me in my room and by the time Mrs. Hemmerle had arrived for the night I was pleasantly tired.

The turning point in my attitude toward blindness began, oddly enough, not with Doctor Unsworth, the eye man, but with Doctor Scoville, the brain man. During a visit shortly after my birthday he asked an unexpected question:

"How would you like to take a little walk?"

I responded eagerly and threw back my sheet, but he made me sit for a minute or two with my legs dangling down from the bed to stimulate their circulation. Then with one hand on his shoulder and the other on the high bed, I eased myself to the floor. My knees and thighs tingled with weakness and I could feel the bones in my feet spreading to support the forgotten weight of my body. During the weeks in bed the soles had become as tender as a baby's and the rug felt rough and prickly.

"Goodness, Peter, you look tall," my mother said.

I laughed. I felt tall. My legs had become long stilts on which I teetered uncertainly. After a moment I steadied and we tried a few steps. Each one felt surer and I smiled self-consciously. Turning made me a little giddy, but back at the bedside I stood for a moment alone, my hands resting on the mattress, testing the extraordinary sensation of standing. Then I climbed onto the bed and sank back.

As a turning point, this had been somewhat less than breath-taking. The following morning, when Wilson helped me to the bathroom, it appeared to mean no more than the end of the bedpan. A few days later, as I climbed into the tub, it marked the end of the bed bath. Soon thereafter it brought the departure of

Pineapple Pear Salad—so delectable with Kraft French Dressing

On a large serving plate covered with leaf lettuce, place 5 slices of pineapple. On each slice, set a pear half, cut side up, and fill the hollow with shredded cheese—use Cracker Barrel brand natural cheddar. Then garnish with watercress and serve with creamy-smooth Kraft French Dressing—the kind that doesn't separate. Its mild-yet-savory flavor sets off this salad to perfection.

A Lenten winner—Shrimp Star Salad with Miracle French Dressing

Cover a large serving plate with leaf lettuce. Arrange 5 wedges of head lettuce on the plate, star-fashion. Criss-cross 2 strips of pimiento on each wedge. Combine cooked shrimp and chopped celery and place between wedges. Serve with Miracle French. This robustly seasoned dressing has a touch of onion and garlic. It does something special for shrimp, and you'll love the way the color sparkles.

both Mrs. Hemmerle and Mrs. Monroe. But all these were minor changes.

From the moment of that first walk, the whole character of my life was transformed. As long as I had remained horizontal, my blindness had scarcely showed its outlines above the bedclothes. Now that I was vertical again, I could begin to make out the long cast of its shadow.

The question of blindness came still farther to the foreground when Doctor Unsworth announced that he was going to reopen my eyelids. While these had been sewed together, I had been able to postpone the consideration of any definite verdict. I braced myself for a difficult ordeal, but I was caught unaware when Doctor Unsworth gave me a shot of morphine in addition to Novocain.

"All finished," Doctor Unsworth said, swabbing off my face and eyes. "Now, let's have a look." He parted my eyelids gently with his fingers. "Look to your left."

Nothing looked any different. Just the same old street lights, burning more brightly than ever, probably because of the morphine. During the examination that followed I tried to focus my drugged attention on his comments. The general health of my eyes was improving. There was less congestion, better muscular control and increased firmness of the cornea tissue, but he did not commit himself on the one thing I had been waiting to hear. The suspense would have to continue.

Like a low fever, it burned steadily until the day when Doctor Denig arrived from New York. An old friend of my grandfather's, he had been called in for consultation with Doctor Unsworth. For a long time he bent over me while I looked in various directions. Then he went downstairs to talk to my parents and Doctor Unsworth. When he returned he was alone.

"So, my dear," he began, giving the back of my hand a little pat. "Be uff goodt cheer."

The "my dear," pronounced in his unmistakably German accent, was both amusing and embarrassing, but the kindliness of his tone reassured me. It was still too early to decide, he said, and in any case it was not doctors but Nature who must decide. She had already performed a miracle in saving my life. Perhaps she would wish to favor me again. I might hope to encourage her by doing everything I could to get well and strong again. I must eat and sleep and get out into the air as soon as possible.

Despite the absence of medical terminology, I knew that he felt the truth of what he was saying, and I liked him for it. When, with a final "Be uff goodt cheer, my dear," he said good-by, I was sorry to have him go. He had confirmed my own instinctive faith that my eyesight would depend on the inexplicable inner power that had saved my life. It would not be difficult to follow his advice. Indeed, I was already "uff goodt cheer." There was nothing to do but wait, and, while I waited, I could do no better than to make myself at home in this foreign setting. I began to explore the character of my temporary blindness.

My first and most obvious problem was simply that of getting from place to place. In my bedroom, I depended on my hands for orientation. To find the bathroom, I would feel my way along the length of my bed, take one freestanding step to grope for the corner of the bureau with my left hand, and then pivot around it to reach for the door with my right. Somewhat to my surprise, the stairs were simple. I had to approach them warily, but once I had located the top step, the equal spacing of the treads and the touch of the banister under my hand made descent easy. In the more complicated furniture arrangement of the living room I used my legs as well as my hands for orientation. My most consistent failure was a tendency to overestimate distance. Every room in the house seemed to have shrunk to two thirds of its former size, and until I learned to slow and shorten my stride I was continually barging into things.

I could always ask my family for guidance, but this, too, had its difficulties. It was hard to make verbal instructions precise and we were amazed at how often we confused left and right when facing each other. On the other hand, to be grabbed by the arm and pushed or pulled in the desired direction was both clumsy and annoying. It was much easier to put my hand on my guide's shoulder and to follow along a little behind and to one side.

Getting around the house was far more awkward than walking outdoors. I recall the first evening my mother and I stepped outside. I kept my hand on her shoulder down the driveway, but after we had turned into the road I let go and held a parallel course by the sound of her footsteps. There were no distances to gauge and no furniture to bump into so that I could walk without hesitating.

There was another reason for my jauntiness that evening, for that was the first time I had got myself fully dressed after weeks in pajamas. I had picked out my clothes very carefully and I can still remember everything I wore. It was terribly important to me to know exactly how I looked. The longing for familiarity was accompanied by an exaggerated fastidiousness. The notion that my pants might be baggy, my shoes unshined or my tie spotted was somehow humiliating and I took the most elaborate precautions with my appearance.

NAVAHO WOMAN AT DAY'S END

By ELIZABETH-ELLEN LONG

Evening is my sister,
Desert dweller,
Daughter of the same dark people.
Evening is my sister,
Weary, like me, of watching silent flocks
And weaving patterns of loneliness.
Outside her hogan at the day's cool end
She sits alone, even as I am sitting now.
Outside her hogan, far to the west,
Waits, as I wait, for the last red hill to fade
And flaming sand to burn itself out,
While flocks of shadows graze, untended,
And only the fingers of wind
Move upon the sky's neglected loom.

While I was still in bed my parents had remodeled a previously unfinished ground-floor room at the back of the house. It had formerly been a large storeroom, and even with the addition of a lavatory in one corner it was more than ample to serve as a combination living and bedroom. When I had moved in with my desk and typewriter, records and phonograph I had the privacy of a separate wing, but if this privacy was not to be purely fictitious, I had to learn to keep my things in order independently.

I tried to discipline my memory and developed a fanatical zeal for neatness, but time and again I would misplace my tie clasp or belt or shoe polish. As I groped through drawers or under the bed my exasperation mounted steadily, and whenever I was forced to call for help I was inwardly boiling.

The true source of my impatience with others was my impatience with myself. My efforts to acquire some tolerance for my own blindness were exhausting. I remember the Herculean struggle of my first attempt to change my typewriter ribbon. It took forever and I came to hate the cobweb silken softness of the ribbon which oozed its ink into my fingers and bent and curled and twisted, but would not slip into the hair-thin grooves of the ribbon guides and carrier. Repeatedly I paused to lean back in my chair to rest and several times I rose to wash the ink from my hands and smoke an entire cigarette, thinking it out in my mind and trying to soothe the nervousness which made my hands shake and my heart pound. When it was over at last, I lay down on my bed to listen to the whole of the Beethoven Seventh.

That summer my records were almost an emotional necessity. They were not simply a means of escape. Apart from the discipline required to memorize the arrangement of two hundred records, I was using them as therapy for my frustrations. It helped me to pace myself to my limitations.

In one instance, blindness proved not to be a limitation. About a month after my first walk I was coming downstairs into the hall when some instinct made me jerk back my head. Putting out my hand, I found that my involuntary movement had saved my forehead a nasty bump on the supporting column at the foot of the staircase.

In a flash, I realized what had happened. Only a few days before, my brother had read me an article on a phenomenon called "facial vision." Facial vision, it explained, was a faculty developed by the blind for estimating the distance, direction and the approximate size of unseen obstacles from the barely audible echoes of incidental sounds reflecting from them. It is a sort of natural radar in which footsteps, voices or even air currents play the part of sound impulses rebounding from opposing surfaces.

I was fascinated by my first experience of it and I stood there for some time, moving my head back and forth beside the column. Each time I approached there was a looming sensation, more like feeling than hearing. Later I found that I could duplicate it by moving my hand toward my ear. I often practiced it sitting in a chair, and when I walked either indoors or out I would listen intently for the telltale contraction of the echoes when I passed through a doorway or under a tree. I played with my discovery as one might play with a new toy.

As a matter of fact, I played with blindness on a number of levels throughout the summer. One of my most absorbing preoccupations was the exploration of it as a social handicap. With the return of my brother Lo from prep school, my horizons widened. He brought friends to the house and drove me to the houses of other people. Together we took walks, attended the movies and went to several parties.

Because I was feeling out the outlines of a new world, the exploratory spirit of youth attracted me. Lo was not unsympathetic toward my blindness, but he did not seem to be fearful about it. Like me, he viewed it with objective curiosity, investigating its mysteries and experimenting with it in a way which my parents would have found impossible.

It was inevitably my brother with whom I felt most closely bound in this experimental attitude, but it is most clearly illustrated by an incident during a visit from two college classmates, Gordy Bent and Bobby Harvey. They were sitting in my room one morning talking while I dressed, when I noticed an undercurrent of laughter in their conversation.

"What's so funny?" I asked, mystified, and their laughter broke into the open.

"It didn't work," Gordy said. "We were trying to fool you."

"We switched your life line," Bobby explained, "to see if it wouldn't throw you off, but you've been wandering around for five minutes without making a single mistake."

My "life line" was a piece of string tied between my bedpost and the bathroom door. Originally, I had used it only to make my way to the lavatory, but they had noticed that I now made frequent contacts with it for purposes of general orientation. Curious to see what would happen, they had transferred one end to another door.

A similar curiosity prompted all sorts of different experiments. While taking a walk that same day, Bobby had stopped me, turned me around a few times to confuse my sense of direction and then asked me to point to where I thought the sun was. Guiding me down a flight of steps, Gordy ducked the shoulder I had my hand on after we had reached the bottom to fool me into taking another downward step. There was no immediate purpose to be served by such experiments, but they were useful as explorations of the extent to which my blindness was or was not a handicap.

My daily discoveries and adjustments to the nature of blindness were part of a continuous process of adaptation. Moreover, because adaptation presupposes acceptance, I was preparing myself for the final acceptance without realizing it. But this acceptance was still only partial.

This was clearly demonstrated in my reaction toward a gift from my other uncle, Whitney Baker. On a weekend visit, he presented me with a Talking Book machine. It was a portable phonograph, much like any other, except that its turntable could be adjusted to revolve at 33⅓ revolutions per minute, a distinct novelty in that day. Uncle Whit explained that by writing to the Library of Congress I could obtain my choice from a large selection of book records, lent to blind readers free of charge. He showed me a sample volume he had brought along. It was Joseph Conrad's The Arrow of Gold, complete on eighteen records. We immediately listened to one side of the first record. I was impressed by the ingenuity of the device, but the following morning when I played the second side the reader's clear, well-modulated voice seemed somehow monotonous and dehumanized. I postponed further reading on the pretext that my mother and I were already reading Tender is the Night, but when we had finished I somehow forgot about The Arrow of Gold. In the fall a post card from the library informed me that it was long overdue and guiltily I returned the records, still unheard.

At about the same time I had my first glimpse into another sort of reading. Returning from an afternoon outing with my brother, I found my mother in the living room with two men from the State Commission for the Blind. They had called to ask whether I would like to take Braille lessons. Because there was nothing else to say, I told them that I was very much interested, and we arranged for a first hour of home instruction with a Mrs. Connor, who would drive over from Hartford the following week. I was distracted as we spoke by an uneven staccato sound from where one of the men was sitting.

"I'm making a note on my Braille slate," he said, giving me my first inkling that he was also blind. "Would you like to see it?"

He explained the slate as he guided my hands over it. Each Braille letter was represented by one or more dots in combination according to six possible positions, arranged like the six on a die. The aluminum slate was like a long rectangular hinge which closed over a piece of stiff Braille paper. There was a series of little windows cut into the upper hinge, and beneath each of these, six indentations on the lower. With a stylus, a small wooden knob with a blunt metal point, he punched out the desired combination of dots through the windows and into the Braille paper enclosed in the hinge. He had written my name and gave it to me, but I could make nothing of the tiny bumps. I felt considerable apprehension about the impending lesson.

Mrs. Connor was a friendly woman of about forty, also blind. She sat on the sofa, and I took a chair facing her across the coffee table, on which she spread out the Braille primer, a large paper-bound book like a clumsy magazine. There were four different grades of Braille, she explained, 1, 1½, 2 and 3. Grade 1 was merely the alphabet, but the others involved an increasingly complex system of abbreviations and contractions, like shorthand. She took my right forefinger and guided it across the page, showing me the symbols for a, b, c, d and e. Mrs. Connor promised that I would make rapid progress if I practiced conscientiously. I did practice for a while, but I found that my hand and wrist, tensing with concentration, tired quickly and developed painful cramps. Therefore, although the mastery of Braille had appealed to me as a sort of mark of virtuosity, like knowing card tricks or the names of the constellations, I practiced only spasmodically. After all, there was no urgency about Braille when I had the Talking Book, and I did not need the Talking Book as long as I had my mother to read to me. So I neglected my Braille, and I used the Talking Book to play, not Conrad but Benny Goodman.

The dual character of my attitude toward blindness was most clearly revealed when a representative of the local draft board called to register me for selective service. In filling out my questionnaire, he asked whether I had any distinguishing marks of identification. The question seemed absurd, but I made a simple answer.

"Blind in both eyes," I said, and then added after a moment's pause, "May be temporary."

Carefully he inked in the words. "Blind in both eyes." Acceptance. "May be temporary." Rejection. The reason for the strength of my rejection at that moment was that I was due for a critical re-examination of my eyes, and was already thinking about the possibility of seeing again.

This time the examination was to take place in the office of Doctor Dunnington in New York. My mother and I drove down in the morning. The nurse led me from one room to another and introduced me to a series of doctors and technicians. I held my head still ar rolled my eyes to the left and to the right, u and down, while they held open my lids ar peered into my pupils.

An hour later I was sitting in a small roo that seemed very quiet. Actually, my moth was with me, but my recollection is of bein quite alone. The day was hot. I lit a cigaret and placed the match in an ash tray on a tab beside me. The office was so high up that, e cept for an occasional automobile horn, I cou not distinguish the various street sounds th floated through the open window.

Doctor Dunnington came in. "Well, M Putnam," he said, "I'm sorry to have kept yo aiting. We've been discussing our findgs."

I can remember that I felt absolutely nothg when I asked him what the verdict was.

"I'm afraid the outlook is not very hopeful. n the opinion of the other doctors and myelf, you will never be able to read again."

The pause while I tried to think what to say emed long, but perhaps I really interrupted efore he could go on.

"Do you mean with or without glasses?"

Immediately I could have bitten my tongue ff. It was an imbecile question, and I felt like n imbecile. It proved that all this time I had een cherishing in my subconscious Doctor Insworth's tale of the bespectacled draftsman. Now, in this unguarded moment, it had etrayed me. I burned with shame, and had to orce my mind to register Doctor Dunnington's explanation. The critical injury had not een inflicted upon the organs of sight. However, the blunt force of the bullet had damaged he optic nerves so badly that there appeared o be no likelihood that I should ever see well nough to read again. The phrasing was faniliar, but always before it had been qualified y "Time will tell." Now time had told. At east, it had told a little. If you could call not eing able to read again a little.

I knew I had been hurt, but I could not feel ny pain yet and so I did not have to hide ain. Listening to my voice, I felt sure that it as natural. The rest of the interview was going to be all right. I discussed it openly with ny mother in the taxi and later that evening ith my grandfather and uncle. We did not void anything, but when we had said what ould be said, we dismissed it and talked of ther things. It was only fter we had gone to bed hat I really had time to hink about it.

If I were to be blind, vhat then? There were lots of things a blind man could lo. There had been many blind writers and many blind teachers. Writing and eaching appealed to me mmensely. I could already type, and all Braille eeded was practice. The shadows had crept a ittle closer. That was all. Even if I could never ead again, I might recover sufficient vision to get around by myself. But never to read again. That hurt. It hurt a lot. Well, there was no use vorrying about it. The first thing I had to do vas to get my strength back. And so, once nore, I rejected my blindness in favor of vaiting.

I waited all summer long, but while I vaited Doctor Dunnington's verdict, like a vaccine injected into my blood stream, circuated slowly through my system. I was not quite ready. Not yet. But unquestionably the sound of his words had been an inoculation for he ultimate acceptance.

Soon after the trip to Doctor Dunnington ny mother, my sister and her children and I drove down for a visit to the Fabers at Manoloking. I had spent part of every summer here for the past ten years, and my familiarity with it enabled me to get around the house with relative ease. Brownie and Lynn were to sleep in the main house, while my mother, my sister and I were to put up in the little guest cabin about forty feet away. As I unpacked my things I felt all the satisfaction of a homecoming.

Since we were to have our meals at the house, one of my first problems was getting back and forth by myself. Shortly after our arrival my sister and I bought a half dozen two-by-fours in six-foot lengths, six ring bolts and a clothesline. My sister laid the line over the sand from the cabin to the terrace of the house, placed the two-by-fours at regular intervals along the way, and I set about burying the ends two feet deep in the sand and passing the clothesline through the ring bolts which I screwed into the uprights.

I derived an immense satisfaction from my work. The squeak of the bolts as I twisted them into the unpainted wood, the cool wetness of the coarse sand in the holes as I dug, the salt breeze blowing against the salt sweat on my face and the sound of the surf, rising and falling, as I raised and lowered my head over the shovel—all these were sensations I had known before.

To make certain that the posts were exactly vertical, I had to balance them carefully before shoveling in the sand around the base. It would have been simpler to call for help, but I had a naïve desire to do it all myself. For the same reason, I went to a great deal of unnecessary trouble in attaching the clothesline. As long as it had lain on the sand, it had furnished my direction between the two houses, but as soon as I fastened it to one of the end posts, I had to pull it up in order to pass it through the next, which destroyed my means of orientation. Swinging the loose end of the rope in front of me, I groped my way across the sand, until I heard it smack against the next upright.

When I had tied the final knot, I put my hand on the rope, walked triumphantly up to the terrace and sat down for a smoke. I was giddy from the heat and the exertion, but I felt hugely pleased with myself.

Perhaps my most vivid memory of the shore that summer was engraved on my senses the next afternoon. Because the ocean was still rather rough, following a storm, I had agreed to postpone my first swim until the weekend when Uncle Ebe could accompany me. When he arrived on the beach I was already waiting for him with my sister. Together we walked down to the water's edge. My skin, baked warm by the heat of the earlier afternoon, was suddenly chilled by the sea breeze of approaching evening, and I picked my way gingerly across the band of broken clamshells and debris left by the high tide.

"Here," Uncle Ebe said. "Let me take your hand."

We walked forward over the wet sand toward the roaring surf. There was a sudden louder rush of water close in front of us, and I let go my uncle's hand at the moment of its impact above my ankles. I could feel its pull as it skidded up around my shins, hissed up the beach behind me, eddied uncertainly just under my knees, and fell back, sucking the sand from underneath my heels. A thrill of goose pimples rose up my thighs, across my chest and spread over my arms, and I backed up the beach toward the sun.

"Warm as toast!" My uncle laughed at my shivering retreat, but he went on ahead.

Back on the drier sand, I tried a few push-ups to get warm. My biceps rebelled on the seventh, and the blood sang in my ears, but I felt refortified and turned back to the ocean. It must be quite rough. I stepped in flecks of foam as I advanced and noticed strips of seaweed whirling by my legs in the next wave. The surf was breaking far out, and the breakers were probably crisscrossing on the way in, but they still had a great deal of force when they reached the beach. Trying not to look like an old man, I stooped self-consciously to scoop up some water and splash it over my face and neck. Uncle Ebe's footsteps plunked up beside me.

"It's good," he called, "but a little rough. Do you want my hand?"

I shook my head and asked him just to tell me when there was a wave big enough to dive through.

We walked forward into the surf. Each time a wave hit my legs I stopped for a moment, bracing myself stiff-legged against the eddying pull.

"Now!" Uncle Ebe shouted, but I had already heard the roar of a big one and was plunging flat. The water hit hard and cold. I could hear it boiling in my ears and felt the sting of the particles of sand and whirling seaweed against my face and chest. The wave rolled over me, its momentum overcoming my forward dive, turning my body a little sideways and floating me back. I twisted around, reached for the bottom with my feet and rose, gasping, wading hard with the flow of waist-deep water before the backward pull could begin. At knee depth my uncle called "Here," and closed his hand on my arm just as another wave caught me under the seat. I ran with it, laughing. Up on the beach, I turned and waved to my uncle. I felt glorious, not cold any more, and anxious to try it again. We had several more dips before going up.

Later Uncle Ebe reported to my mother, "Cuphandles did fine," using his old pet name for me. "There was a moment there when I thought he was going to get himself boiled, but he sailed right up on the beach."

"I'm glad it was a success," my mother said, "but remember, darling, just be careful."

"Don't worry, mamma. I will."

I was finding it hard not to think of myself as some sort of conquering hero. Physically, I felt wonderful. My skin tingled to the remembrance of sun and salt, and in all my muscles there was an elasticity that I had forgotten. Sitting on the terrace, scenting the fresh sea air, hearing the distant surf, I was filled with contentment. Beyond the waving eel grass of the dunes, I knew just how the ocean looked. I knew how the bay, glittering under the late-afternoon sun, looked; and close around me I knew how the terrace and the white Adirondack chairs and the people sitting in them looked. At that moment the idea of blindness, past, present or future, simply did not exist.

I swam nearly every day after that, usually three or four times. Within a week I had gained such confidence that I attempted a relatively daring feat. I had waked very early, and found it impossible to go back to sleep. I put on my bathing suit, and made my way up to the terrace. There I lingered for a while in the hope of meeting Aunt Julie on her way for a prebreakfast swim, but there were no sounds of stirring life inside the house. At last I made up my mind. I felt my way along the narrow, slatted walk to the bulwark, squared my heels against the pair of steps on the other side, and walked as straight as I could across the hundred yards or more of sand to where the surf of low tide washed peacefully on the beach. Not daring to hesitate for fear of losing my direction, I walked straight into the water until it was over knee depth, took one long flat dive into a roller, turned at what I hoped was a one-hundred-and-eighty-degree angle and walked straight back across the beach. After what seemed like a very long time, my toe struck the bulkhead. I felt along its length until I had found the steps and then returned as I had come. There was no actual danger in all this. The sea was calm, the tide was low and I had ventured out scarcely above my knees, but my uncle's house was one of only three within half a mile, the wide and deserted beach could not be seen from the house. If I had missed my reckoning I should have been forced to wander up and down for painful minutes before the humiliation of a rescue. Nowadays, perhaps I might have allowed such a contingency to outweigh the pleasure of a morning dip. It was different that summer and from that time I made a regular habit of this solitary morning swim.

About the middle of August my mother and sister left me in sole possession of the cabin. My father had been ordered to the Cavalry Replacement Training Center in Fort Riley, Kansas, and my mother was going to accompany him to help him get settled. At the same time my brother-in-law had been transferred to Fort Orde, California, and although my sister could not join him until the fall, she had to supervise the packing and removal of her furniture from the West Point quarters.

And so I became master of my own ménage. After my morning dip and breakfast with Aunt Julie, I returned to the cabin to do my household chores. Although Aunt Julie protested, I enjoyed making my bed, emptying the ash trays and sweeping out the sand to the musical accompaniment of Benny Goodman or Louis Armstrong records. Occasionally I wrote letters. My typing was improving steadily, and although I sometimes lost my train of thought, my memory and power of concentration were improving too.

If it were a weekday I might either accompany my aunt on a shopping expedition to carry the packages or go out on the beach with her children, Theo and Timmy. On weekends my uncle and I often went sailing on the sloop which he kept moored in the bay. I remembered her well and could take over the tiller, provided he kept an eye out for approaching boats or a looming shore line.

After the noon swim and lunch there was always a long nap, followed by more bathing and an evening at the main house. When at last I went to bed, lulled by the pounding of the surf, I was at peace with myself and slept soundly through the night.

I was very close to both Uncle Ebe and Aunt Julie. They were younger than my parents and their companionship was very congenial, but it did not fully satisfy the craving for contemporaries that I had noticed in Litchfield. All the friends of the preceding summer were back in Mantoloking, but I was particularly indebted to a college classmate, Everett Allan. Because my uncle's house was over a mile and a half from the center of Mantoloking, I had a transportation problem. In the daytime my aunt could drop me at the Mantoloking Garage, which Ev was managing for the summer, and two or three times I walked along the shore to the bathing beach where I had arranged to be met, but in the evenings I depended on Ev to pick me up in his car, and he was very generous with his time.

With Ev and my other friends, I continued the exploration of blindness. There was one night when, under Ev's direction, I drove his car at a snail's pace for a mile along a deserted back road. Another time we played darts together in a local tavern until a wild shot extinguished the light bulb above the target. A more conservative form of amusement was a trip to the movies. I found I needed a minimum of explanation to visualize the action. My years of movie-going had engraved the faces and mannerisms of the stars and a majority of the bit players on my memory. Afterward we generally stopped for a hamburger and a beer. It was to a tune from a jukebox at the Point Pleasant Inn that I tried my first dancing. Occasionally my partner had to warn me away from another couple or a table, but I enjoyed it immensely. Later Ev and I took girls to the Saturday-night dances at the Bay Head Yacht Club.

Durinda insisted she could teach Peter to ski. "Durinda provided the irresistible incentive. My decision to ski was an affair of the heart."

The festive atmosphere of these dances was contagious, but conversation above the din was difficult. It was embarrassing to be silent amid all the gaiety, but in the movement and confusion I was often uncertain as to whom I was speaking. Two or three times I found myself shouting some fatuous remark to the empty chair vacated by a friend who had moved on minutes before. Abruptly I felt terribly, terribly blind.

If blindness was a social handicap at the yacht-club dances, it was rather an asset in smaller gatherings. Whether from a slightly morbid curiosity or simple Christian charity, everyone was very kind to me, and I became, for a time, the center of attention wherever I went. My natural vanity was flattered, and I could not help enjoying the new role, particularly with girls. After all, why shouldn't I? In learning to swim, to run, to sail, to attend movies and dances, I had managed to minimize my handicap in certain ways. If I could capitalize on it in my relations with girls, what harm was there?

I especially recall the night Ev drove me to a party at the house of a girl whom I had seen a great deal the preceding summer. The purpose of the party was to introduce a couple of Smith classmates who were staying with her for a few days, and I was absurdly pleased to find that I had met them both before. One had been the belle of the ball at a Hill School dance, and I had met the other on the train from Battle Creek, while on my way to Princeton as a freshman. The geographical range of these chance encounters made me feel like a national figure, and when they played up to the situation I was on the crest of the wave.

But my good opinion of my popularity received a shock not long afterward. A girl who had been responsive on several previous occasions turned suddenly evasive when I asked for another date. After two or three failures on the telephone, I mentioned my misgivings to Ev. It turned out that she had already confided in him. She really liked me, Ev said, but she felt that I was beginning to "get serious,"

"Lose Fat Without Agonizing Diets"

says MRS. ROBERT CUMMINGS*

"As a wife, and mother of four children, I'd be thin as a rail—if exercise alone could make you lose weight," says Mary Cummings. "Fortunately, I found time to read about the Ayds Plan in a magazine article. Now, I always rely on Ayds to help keep my weight down.

"Ayds helps me take off fat easily. About 15 minutes before each meal, I take one or two delicious Ayds candies, as directed. Ayds low-calorie appetite-appeaser starts right in. Ayds also supplies the essential vitamins and minerals my body needs.

"At mealtime, I'm just not as hungry. I do without the heavy foods . . . eat much less . . . take off pounds the natural way. I just couldn't be more satisfied with delicious Ayds."

Mary Cummings gave up her stage career for five good reasons: Patricia, Bob Jr., Baby Laurel, Bob and Melinda. Says Mary: "Staying at your ideal weight is sometimes hard—until you discover Ayds. What a blessing."

Clinically Proved: At a New England clinic Ayds Reducing Plan vitamin and mineral candy was scientifically found best! Scores of overweight men and women were tested. Ayds users lost nearly twice as many pounds as those who tested the second best product—without suffering uneasiness, sleeplessness, irritating side effects. An actual reprint of the Medical Journal report of the famous Ayds test at a New England clinic is now available. See your doctor before reducing. Have him write for the report to: Campana, Box MD, Batavia, Illinois.

Money-back Guarantee: Ayds users report losing up to ten pounds and more with the first box. Do as thousands do. Lose fat the modern Ayds way. Proved by doctors. Proved by the public. Prove it yourself. Lose weight now with your first box, only $2.98, or money back. Ayds—at drug and department stores.

and had decided it would be better to discourage any romantic involvement before it could develop. I laughed off this rebuff, but inwardly I was both hurt and angry.

For several days I nursed my wounded pride, but I had to admit that, perhaps, I had got what I deserved. If I were to put myself forward as a blind man, then I must expect to be treated as one. I had been trading on my handicap to build up social capital, but what had I done to overcome this handicap? I had viewed even Braille as a game. I had not tried to think about the future, in terms of a systematic adjustment to my difficulties. Instead, I had postponed all decisions in a moral blindness which was the worse in that it had been intentional.

The summer was drawing to its close. I could run a mile, do twenty push-ups or swim for half an hour without being winded. My weight was close to 160 pounds, and although I still seemed to need an afternoon nap, I felt alert and energetic throughout the rest of the day. Did I still harbor some fugitive hope that someday I was going to recover my sight?

Undressing for bed late one night, I determined to put myself to the test. Sitting down on my bed deliberately, I bent my head over the lamp on my night table and snapped it on. There was a flick behind my eyes, like the leap of a tiny electric spark, and then the ugly wavering glare of the street lights in the misty blackness. Was the blackness less black? I turned it off and felt another flick. On. Flick. Off. Flick. On. Flick. I stared into the bulb behind the street lights, then—methodically rolling my head from side to side, bringing it to rest each time at center—began counting up to ten, snapping the switch each time I reached the number, in a kind of hypnotic trance beyond which I could hear the steady drone of the surf, the song of the toads, the piping of the crickets, the restless flutter of the moths on the screen.

"Peter?" I started up guiltily as Aunt Julie's voice came through the window.

"Oh, hi, Jule. Is anything the matter?"

"That's what I wanted to ask you. I saw this mysterious flickering from my window, like a mariner in distress, and wondered whether there was anything I could do to help."

"Oh," I said, thinking fast. "I just couldn't figure out whether the light was on or off and didn't want to leave it burning."

"Well, it's on now. Are you sure that's all you wanted?"

"Yes. I'm terribly sorry to bring you all the way down here. I should have unscrewed the bulb."

"All right, then. If you're sure everything's O.K., I'll get back to bed." Her voice retreated across the sand.

Looking down at the light for the last time, I snapped it off. There was no difference. It was clear that the illusion of light was only an illusion, traceable to the sensation of heat on my face above the glowing bulb. I got into bed and lay back, filled with a kind of cold anger and contempt for my obstinate refusal to accept the obvious. No one could help me with this one. This was up to me.

The next morning I typed a letter to Doctor Scoville. Choosing my words carefully, I explained that although I thought I had accepted my handicap earlier, I found that there were still stubborn pockets of resistance within me. The time had come to remove the last lingering doubts and therefore, although the request reflected no lack of confidence in previous medical advice, I would appreciate his recommendation of a good nerve specialist with whom I might have one last consultation. It had not been an easy letter to write, but having written it, I felt suddenly emancipated. Very soon, now, I should be under way.

Three weeks later, I was sitting next to my sister on a train bound for Baltimore and an appointment with Dr. Walter E. Dandy, of Johns Hopkins. My voice sounded strange, as I reminisced lightheartedly about weekend trips to Baltimore in college days. Walking through the station, I pointed out the restaurant where my friends and I used to drink a last beer before boarding the train back to Princeton, but once inside the taxi, all sense of familiarity ceased.

Johns Hopkins was another world. We walked down hundreds of yards of corridor, pausing to inquire the way, and when at last we had found Doctor Dandy's door, we sat on a wooden settee in silence. I was hot and tired, and in the anonymous hall, in the hearing of other patients, there was nothing to say. There was nothing to think about either.

I was surprised, when my turn came, to have Doctor Dandy himself greet us at the door. The examination was brief, but before it was half over I think I knew what the verdict would be. Doctor Dandy delivered it gently, and when he had finished he leaned over, squeezed my hand and said, "You're a brave boy."

I cannot remember what else he said. I was only thinking how to say good-by and thank you and get out of there. Emerging into the corridor, I could feel that my face was stiff.

"Gee, Pete," Bimbi said in a low voice.

"It's O.K." I did not want to talk about it there. We did not say anything on the long walk through the corridors or in the taxi in front of the driver, or in the station restaurant, in front of the waitress. We each ordered a beer and a club sandwich, and when the waitress had gone Bimbi reached across the table and gave my hand a little squeeze.

"It's going to be O.K., Pete."

"Sure it is," I said. "It's only what I expected, and now I know where I stand."

After all, the situation had not really changed and there was no use quibbling about the "brave boy" line. I had had a wonderful summer and I had not really tackled the problem as yet. I had a lot to learn, but I had time to learn it in and I could take one thing at a time.

Do not crowd your schedule with useless things and leave the preparation of lessons to the last minute before class. Leave room for emergencies. For as you read or study, some new thought, quite apart from the lesson, may arise in your own mind. When it does, stop reading; follow that thought, wrestle with it, try to master it. Don't moon about it. Think! If you suspect you are mooning, take a pencil and put the main outlines of what you are thinking on paper. If none of it can be written out, you are only mooning.

In these times when so much is being done in the world to suppress freedom and independence of thought, I make one final plea that all young people in American colleges will be mindful of their particular obligation to maintain and develop in their own persons this most precious element in the heritage of the United States and mankind.

The summer was over and from Johns Hopkins I went directly back to Litchfield. My father was in Fort Riley, my brother had returned to prep school, and when my sister had left with her children for California, my mother and I were quite alone on the farm. It was quiet there, but beneath the tremulous calm of the fading Indian summer I felt the restless stirrings of a seasonal change of spirit.

The status quo could not continue. It was unfair to both my parents to have my father alone in Fort Riley while my mother played nursemaid to me through the long winter. But that was only part of it. The visit to Doctor Dandy had changed my whole perspective. While my blindness had been temporary, my adjustment to it had been confined to going over the same ground in the dark. Now the temporary had become the permanent and I was forced to reckon with the future.

The immediate future meant a return to Princeton. Blind or not, the first step toward any more-distant career would have to be the completion of my college education, and I had never thought of any other college. Indeed, I had already discussed the possibilities with a friend much earlier in the summer. Speaking for his five roommates, he had made me a generous offer. I could room with them, he said, and they could take turns leading me to classes and reading me my assignments. What with my Braille, typing and the Talking Book, I had agreed that there were no insurmountable obstacles. I had agreed, but in the active involvements of Mantoloking the plan had seemed remote. Exiled to the lonely solitude of the farm, it became the only means of escape from an intolerable situation and I found myself compelled to take the initiative.

I began by writing a letter to Princeton, requesting readmittance for the spring term. Trying not to appear willfully optimistic, I outlined a full program for the solution of my problems. The letter itself was proof of my ability to type, and I exaggerated the extent of my progress with Braille and the value of the Talking Book. I touched on the psychological importance of returning before my classmates had graduated, but I did not stress any practical dependence upon them. I could hire self-help students who were taking the same courses to read aloud assignments which they would have to do in any case.

I could not, of course, say the most important things—that I longed to translate into action all the energy of my new-found love of life. I could only hope that what I left unsaid would lend some of its desperate sincerity to the cold logic of my reasoning.

What I believed would speak eloquently of my affirmative attitude was the statement that I planned to acquire a Seeing Eye dog. As far back as June, my mother had written to the Seeing Eye and I had passively acquiesced in filling out a tentative application, but I had no heart for the plan. I recoiled from the possession of a Seeing Eye dog as a permanent badge of handicap, and the printed information my mother read to me sounded singularly unappetizing. I would have to spend several weeks at the training school in Morristown with a group of other blind students. The regimen of the course promised to be extremely ascetic, and the notion that throughout it I would be an object of philanthropy was humiliating. The fact that I was willing to submit myself to such humiliation ought to be the firmest pledge of sincerity to the Princeton authorities.

Having asserted that I would acquire a dog before the spring term opened in February, I immediately wrote to the Seeing Eye to announce that I must have a dog by February in order to return to Princeton. I was playing both ends against the middle, but my conviction in the essential rightness of my course was so strong that I scarcely recognized the hypocrisy of my position.

While I waited for the outcome of these negotiations I studied the hateful little dots in my Braille primer and practiced writing with my slate and stylus. I ordered another Talking Book volume and forced myself to adjust to the new form of reading. I did setting-up exercises and took long walks with my mother to harden myself for the physical strain of the Seeing Eye course. Still the time passed slowly, and when a letter from Princeton promised only a careful consideration of my request, I asked my mother to drive me down for a personal meeting with Dean Gauss.

It was an uneasy interview. Imagining the serene, tolerant, always half-amused lines around his mouth and eyes, I thrust my arguments forward to penetrate the veil of silent space that hung between us. I tried to anticipate every objection, and when he made none I felt as if I had been charging against an enemy who had unexpectedly retired through the mist. He had been conciliatory and sympathetic but gently, firmly noncommittal as to the verdict of the committee which would have to pass on my case.

I decided to pursue the attack on the other front. I telephoned the Seeing Eye and arranged for an appointment the following Monday. The interview with Mrs. Campbell began with much of the same indefinite quality as that with Dean Gauss. She, too, was courtly but reserved. When she called for an instructor to test my co-ordination I followed him eagerly out to the driveway where he led me about in a series of quick turns by a U-shaped leather handle similar to those attached to the dogs' harnesses.

The most I had expected from the visit was an indefinite commitment, so that when we went inside I was taken aback by Mrs. Campbell's announcement that there had been a cancellation in the class to begin the following Sunday. Could I be ready to enroll at that time? I hesitated only long enough to offer my mother a chance to speak, and then I took the plunge. Certainly I could.

As I thought over what I knew about the Seeing Eye through the next six days I felt the chill of misgivings. It was going to be a lonely time. The sense of total isolation I anticipated had been summed up in Mrs. Campbell's answer to the sole question I had asked about the course. Would I be allowed to bring a portable phonograph and some records? Her refusal was polite but firm.

"You'll be too busy with your dog," she said, "to allow time for other distractions, and in any case, your roommates may not be music lovers."

Faced with the prospect of so dreary an environment, I suffered gnawing doubts as to my ability to master the training. Many people, I knew, had failed in the past and been forced to leave the Seeing Eye without dogs. I had pinned all my hopes on the procurement of such a dog. Without it, there would be no returning to Princeton, and without Princeton I could see nothing ahead. In a breath-taking turn of events the Seeing Eye had become the sole bridge to the future. Cross it I must, and I must cross it alone.

About three o'clock the following Sunday afternoon my mother turned the car into the driveway of the Seeing Eye. I was unloading my bags from the back of the station wagon when I heard footsteps on the gravel and a cheerful voice which identified itself as Mr. Northrup, the instructor for my class. We shook hands and I followed him into the big house.

He gave terse, accurate instructions as to steps, halls and doorways, supplemented by slaps of his hand on doorjambs, columns and railings, but whenever my mother offered to guide me he interrupted his chatter to call out, "Let him do it himself, Mrs. Putnam." When he had pounded out the position of my bureau, bed and closet and shown me the lavatory, he ushered us into a place which was called the Recreation Room and left us.

With all my heart I believe that our people have in them the same patriotism, the same nobility of soul to which Washington and Lincoln were able to appeal.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT

Our paths did not cross again until about half an hour later. My mother had left for New York to catch her train for Fort Riley and I was returning from the front porch where I had waved her off. Crossing the hall, I groped for the stair railing.

"Keep your head up, Mr. Putnam," he called from an upper landing, "and stand up straight."

In reaching for the railing I had allowed my head to creep forward on my neck and my shoulders to round. I stiffened guiltily.

"I'm sorry," I said and immediately blushed at the foolishness of the apology.

"It's all right," he said cheerfully. "It's a frequent mannerism of the new blind, but it's a good thing to catch early." And he bounded up the stairs. My education at the Seeing Eye had begun.

My principal recollection of the hours that followed is one of aimless boredom. We were not to receive our dogs for three days, and the time of waiting seemed unjustifiably long. Twice a day we heard short lectures from Mr. Humphrey, in charge of training, on the general principles of guide-dog technique. Each morning and afternoon Mr. Northrup provided a few minutes of practical application. Dividing the class into shifts of four each, he drove us to Morristown, where he led us about the streets, one at a time, by a U-shaped harness handle like the one I had used the week before.

We used the code name, Juno, in addressing the mythical dog whose part was played by Mr. Northrup, and as we followed him about a simple route issued the commands, "Juno, right," "Juno, forward," or "Juno, left," as the situation demanded. Mr. Humphrey had already explained that we must reward our dogs for every correct action in the performance of their duty. This reward was to be given verbally in the form of "Atta good girl!" intoned with all the simulated rapture we could muster. So it was that, as the ebullient Mr. Northrup stopped and started at curbs, turned to right or left, crossed and recrossed streets, I found myself, again and again, praising his unwavering obedience with a phrase which lost none of its absurdity through frequent repetition, "Atta good girl, Juno!"

The lectures were interesting and the walks ere fun, but they consumed no more than vo or three hours every day. The rest of the me was spent in the dreary monotony of aiting. We waited for walks, for lectures and or meals. We waited to get up and waited to o to bed again, and there was nothing to do ut smoke, listen to the radio or talk to the ther students. Many a time in those three lays I thought bitterly of Mrs. Campbell's emark that I would be too busy for the disraction of my phonograph records. But all his was forgotten in the excitement of my rst meeting with Minnie.

As with everything else at the Seeing Eye, his followed a formula worked out through he experience of many years. One at a time, e were taken into the Recreation Room for he ceremony. When my turn came, Mr. Northrup sat me in a chair facing the door nd explained the procedure. He gave me a iece of meat in one hand and a leash in the ther. When Minnie appeared, I was to offer er the meat, and while she was eating it snap he leash on her chain collar. Then with a horus of "Atta good girl," I was to lead her o my room, play with her, pat her and make riends. When I had repeated these instructions Mr. Northrup left me alone and hurried off to the kennels to fetch her. The big front loor of the house slammed, and there was silence. I waited.

Minnie, I thought. What a name! I had earned it only that morning. I had learned, oo, that she was a German shepherd, faun-colored, spayed, and weighing fifty-nine ounds. I could hear the ticking of my grandather's watch in my pocket and the pounding of my heart inside my rib cage. I fingered the snap on the leash in my right hand and felt the raw hamburger, cool and moist, in the palm of my left. I wished I knew whether I had time to ight a cigarette.

Then the front door slammed again and I forgot everything else. I heard Mr. Northrup's voice, cooing encouragement to the dog that had been his and was to be mine. I heard the sound of her eager whimpering as they approached the top of the stairs, the click of her claws on the linoleum floor as they crossed the hall. And then I heard her come through the door in a rush.

"Here, Minnie," I said, holding out the hamburger. But she was half in my lap, snuffling my clothes, licking my face, and wiggling excitedly all over, a living thing of warmth and fur and breath and movement which burst through the dead statistics of the morning. It seemed a full minute before I was able to give her the meat. I clipped on the leash and, technically at least, she was mine. I rose.

"Minnie, heel!" I commanded. "Atta good girl!" Mr. Northrup followed us out of the room and down the hall, telling me to jerk back on the leash to make Minnie, who was straining ahead excitedly, walk quietly beside my knee. At the door of the bedroom he took my elbow.

"Be good to her, Mr. Putnam," he said. "She's a beautiful blond bitch, perfectly suited to a Princeton man."

Unforgettable as was my introduction to Minnie, it faded by comparison with the thrill of our first walk together. The following morning in Morristown, she waited at sit beside me, making quick nervous little gestures in her impatience to be off, but Mr. Northrup was deliberately reviewing the final details. Her leash, looped over to half its length, was to be coiled around the second and third fingers of my left hand, and then all four fingers were to be held in a light grip around the harness handle. That way, he explained, if I lost hold of the handle, I would still have her by the leash.

I grasped the handle with my leashed fingers to demonstrate my understanding, and Minnie got up.

"Put her at sit again," Mr. Northrup said, and when I had done so, reprimanded me sharply. "Reward your dog, Mr. Putnam!"

"Atta good girl, Minnie," I cooed.

"All right." Mr. Northrup stepped back. "Whenever you're ready."

I picked up the harness handle and Minnie started off eagerly before I had time to give her the command.

"Atta good girl," I repeated hurriedly, following her along the sidewalk. It was an amazing sensation.

From the moment we began, my mind was divided into two parts. The first concentrated on the technical details and mechanics of walking, the proper break in the wrist, the relaxed grip on the harness handle, the co-ordination of my movements with Minnie's. The other part of my mind was devoted to pure sensation. We were moving rapidly along the quiet street. With Mr. Northrup, we had traveled the same route at the same speed of four miles an hour, and yet this was different. It was as if, having learned to post the trot on a mechanical horse in a gymnasium, I was now on a live horse for the first time or as if, having mastered the steps of the waltz to the one, two, three of the dancing instructor, I now found myself waltzing with a real partner. The harness handle was identical to the one Mr. Northrup had used, but now it pulsed with the animal rhythm of Minnie's smoothly rotating shoulders. When she swerved around an oncoming pedestrian, hesitated at the grade of a driveway, or stopped for a curb, her movements had the instinctive grace of nature.

Minnie's arrival did more than put new life into the harness handle. It helped to explain, and therefore mitigate, the asceticism of our whole regimen. Getting up at six in the morning to take them out was not pleasant in itself, but it was certainly a reasonable concession to the dogs. For the first days, we were asked to stay out of the Recreation Room, to simplify their adjustment to their new surroundings, and even to stop smoking, to avoid offending their sensitive nostrils. We fed them personally, curried and brushed them once a day, and did not leave them to themselves for an instant. At night Minnie slept on the floor beside my bed, and during the day she accompanied me everywhere—including the lavatory when I washed and shaved—to spare

Let "Lysol" do the dirty work

Puts an invisible shield of protection between you and mess • Deep-penetrates cracks to seek out trouble • Gives your home a pleasant, fresh, just-cleaned air

Add "Lysol" to your suds. It deep cleans, deodorizes, disinfects. Does more than go into cracks and crevices. It sweetens and freshens as it cleans—as nothing else can!

"Lysol" goes after food particles that fall in out-of-the-way spots. Controls germ-caused spoilage, odors. Makes garbage pail nice-smelling. Use it any place decay might happen!

No job is too nasty for "Lysol"! It goes after slime and grime, cobwebs and clutter. Does the dirty work for you, yet it shields you and your household from unpleasantness.

"Lysol" kills musty, dusty odors by killing their source—fungus. Sweeps away stale smells, leaves the air sparkling fresh! No extra work with "Lysol" brand disinfectant.

"Lysol" kills disease germs on contact. The protective action lasts 7 full days—168 times longer than bleaches! Yet, the new, lighter odor won't linger. You'll like it!

her the pain of even the briefest separation from me.

The wonder, the miracle which grew rather than diminished on reflection, was the fact that such separation could actually cause her pain, but there was no doubting it. From the end of her chain, she watched my every move, crawling back and forth under the bed as I wandered from bureau to closet when dressing, or raised her head quickly if I happened to scrape my chair back in the course of typing a letter. Her capacity for affection seemed boundless, and to me, who had expected the attitude of my guide dog to be one of austere and distant loyalty, Minnie's puppyish ecstasy in play, nipping my hands as I patted her, or laving my face with her tongue when she wanted attention, was another of those gratifying surprises I encountered at every turn.

As the course gradually unfolded through Mr. Humphrey's lectures and Mr. Northrup's comments on our daily walks, the logic and care behind even the most trivial details of our training made a deep impression on my mind. All forms of correction were verbal, falling into three different categories. When our dog appeared to be dawdling, sniffing or generally inattentive, we might employ the words, "Hopp, hopp!" meaning roughly, "Get a wiggle on." It was to be pronounced with a rising inflection in a tone of encouragement. Growling, barking or failure to obey a previous command called for a clear rebuke, "Quit it!" spoken in a guttural, menacing tone. The most serious offenses, such as forgetting to stop for curbs, bumping us into obstacles or deliberate disobedience, were to be met with the severest reprimand, "Pfui!" mouthed with all the venom of which we were capable. So terrible was this imprecation that we were strictly forbidden its use during the first two weeks of the course. If a "Pfui" was in order, Mr. Northrup intervened to administer it. In special instances, such as a dogfight or an emptying inside the house, a leash correction, consisting of a sharp jerk on the leash, was a physical supplement to the purely vocal means of reproof, but it was regarded as a supplement only, a preliminary warning for the purpose of focusing the dog's attention on the awful "Pfui" which was to follow. Corporal punishment was absolutely prohibited.

The importance of moderation and justice in applying these forms of correction was illustrated by one of the anecdotes with which Mr. Humphrey sprinkled his lectures. It centered on a former student who tried to dominate his dog completely, jerking her around on the leash and reproving her with "Pfuis" for the slightest failures. Ultimately, showing a thoroughly human understanding of her rights, the dog walked with her blind master straight into a telephone pole, no mean reprisal in view of the speed with which we walked.

"You can't make these dogs do anything," Mr. Humphrey stated bluntly. "And the reason you can't is because you're blind, and they know it. They do what they do because they want to, and they won't want to unless you say 'Atta good girl,' every time they do, and sound as if you mean it every time you say it."

He followed with a story of a quite different sort of student, a man who deeply loved and admired his dog. He had progressed rapidly at the Seeing Eye, but some time after he returned home he began to experience a puzzling difficulty. His dog continued to perform smoothly in the streets, but no sooner had they left for work in the morning than she began to employ every method she knew to confuse his orientation and bring him back to his own front door. It developed that whereas he often got down to play with her on the living-room floor of his home, he had forgotten to express his gratitude for her efforts in the street. As a result, she sought always to return as soon as possible to that spot with which she associated her master's approval. As soon as he was reminded to reward her with the magical "Atta good girl," she became a cheerful and willing worker.

But if guide-dog techniques were simple in theory, there were a thousand and one complexities in practical application and my growing confidence was repeatedly shaken during my daily walks with Minnie. Morristown was an ideal testing ground. There was a business district with overhanging awnings, crowds of Christmas shoppers and heavy traffic, as well as a shanty town with yelping mongrels and cracked and broken pavements. There was a park with curving walks and distracting squirrels, as well as residential streets with children on roller skates, baby carriages and express wagons. There were disturbing diagonal crossings, high and low curbs, a long flight of irregularly spaced steps, a railroad station with clattering trains and hurrying travelers, and a construction project which filled the air with the nerve-racking staccato of pneumatic drills. Through all this maze of noise and confusion, I walked with Minnie daily. The formula for reward and correction was simple enough, but it was difficult to tell, when Minnie swerved suddenly to the left, whether she was preparing to chase a neighborhood cat or trying to take me around a parked baby carriage. If I misinterpreted her motives, I might be guilty of either reproving a good deed or rewarding a misdemeanor, both of which contingencies filled me with despair.

That which complicated all the other problems was the necessity of memorizing the route. Contrary to a still popular misconception, it is the master and not the dog who selects the itinerary. The dog is responsible for her master's safety as she guides him through moving traffic and stationary obstacles, but it is up to him to direct her with rights and lefts at curbs and intersections. For this reason he must know exactly where he is at any given moment. To accustom us to this necessity, Mr. Northrup outlined the itinerary of each walk before we started and then followed us, keeping silent as much as possible in order to simulate real conditions.

Accuracy of memory was crucial. Since the number of blocks on one side of the street was frequently not the same as on the other, to confuse "cross, and turn right," with "turn right, and cross" was to court disaster, and Members of our How America Lives family (see page 181) take turns cooking. Gerald's cap was a gift from Kathy (center). Carol and Darlene approve.

Gerald Dennerlein says, "No woman can do a complete job of housekeeping and carry a full-time job too. We all pitch in on the housework."

By MARGARET DAVIDSON
Homemaking Editor of the Journal

"Where do you find time? How do you get things done?" Rosellen Dennerlein, of Long Beach, California, manages to hold a job because the whole family helps provide the answers. "We have our own system," she says. "A working family really has to decide its own values and it's all a matter of what's important to the people involved." In some ways today's working wife lives by the books her mother and grandmother lived by—in others she turns the rules topsy-turvy to fit her own revolutionized working life.

TAKE CARE OF LITTLE THINGS AND BIG THINGS TAKE CARE OF THEMSELVES

"We all know our jobs in the morning. It's a clockwork schedule then, but it's worth it." The alarm rings at 6:10 and for an hour the house hums with activity. Rosellen allows herself ten minutes to cook breakfast, including heating the plates. "Even in California an egg is pretty sad on a cold plate," Gerry says. Darlene, the oldest daughter, makes two beds. Carol, 15, and Kathy, 12, make two more beds, clear the table and wash the dishes, and Kathy feeds Joey, the pet parakeet. Darlene leaves first, and at 7:40 the rest of the family start to their various schools.

After school, the first ones home take on most-immediate jobs. Gerry usually finishes work by 3:30, so he shops and starts dinner. As the girls come home they pick up the house, work at chores, set the table. Dinner is usually on the table at 5:30 except when the whole family votes to go for a swim—"then we'll serve later—it's flexible."

FREE FOR ALL EVENINGS

After-dinner hours are usually left unassigned. "We don't believe in being utter slaves—you need time for doing what you want," Gerry and Rosellen agree. This year one of the things he wants to do is work on his doctorate. About twelve hours a week he and Rosellen together research and type, write letters, tabulate questionnaires and make graphs toward his degree. "If we get everything else done earlier in the day, we don't have to fight our consciences in the evening. That's where we reap the benefit of the busy schedule we have in the morning and afternoon."

A STITCH IN TIME SAVES FAMILY AFFECTIONS FROM COMING APART

Often in the evening Rosellen picks up her sewing. "It's a way of unwinding and I enjoy being domestic. While I'm holding a job I can't do all the dressmaking I'd like to, but the loose buttons or the hem that needs mending gets done while Gerry reads aloud and the family never feels neglected that way. I still feel my job is temporary and once the girls are through school I'll stop—let's see, that will be nine years more! But in the meantime we have all the satisfaction of giving them good music, dancing lessons and a college education." She rolls up a pair of Gerry's mended socks. "If I had all the rest of the housework to do, too, I'd never have time to make my family feel cared for with little attentions—and sometimes they're the most important."

PUT OFF TILL TOMORROW WHAT YOU CAN DO BETTER THEN

"There are small things we have to do every day—dishes, meals, bedmaking and general orderliness. We learned by experience that if you fall behind in the daily chores you never each succeeding turn and crossing, even though correctly remembered, would take us farther off our course.

I know nothing in my experience of blindness more trying than the sense of being lost. The sudden thrill of panic which gripped me on the realization that I did not know where I was recalled those nightmare moments of my childhood when, losing sight of my family in a European city, I felt myself deserted and alone in the midst of crowds whose language I could neither speak nor understand. I broke into a cold sweat and my nervousness seemed somehow to impart itself to Minnie. When she stopped suddenly at a curb, my foot slipped over the edge, and my "Atta good girl" sounded perfunctory. She stirred restlessly as I tried to decide our next move.

"Waiting for a streetcar, Mr. Putnam?" Mr. Northrup spoke in my ear. "I'm getting hungry. Let's get back to lunch. Cross and turn left to the station wagon."

My tension vanished in laughter at his good-natured way of setting me straight, but when afternoon came I had to face the same bewildering variety of problems all over again.

With time and practice, my memorization of the routes and my physical co-ordination with Minnie improved. The most valuable lesson a Seeing Eye dog owner can learn is also the simplest. He must understand that he is blind and that his dog can see. This adds up to a human limitation and a canine potentiality. On the other hand, the owner has the power of reason, while the dog has a set of powerfully irrational instincts, and this adds up to a human potentiality and a canine limitation. Both have the power to love which alone can make possible the patience, the concentration and the self-discipline to weld the two—the man animal and the dog animal—into a working team. Through love they learn to recognize and to forgive both their own and each other's limitations and to realize their joint potentialities.

The growth of my new understanding and respect for my own limitations expressed itself in a new understanding and respect for my classmates. Despite all the differences in our backgrounds and temperaments, we got along famously together. We felt the same pride and affection for our dogs, experienced the same difficulties, and possessed the same determination to succeed. The nervous energy generated to meet the strain of the course had to have a release, and, because the Seeing Eye had made us optimists, we found that release in laughter. Some of the things we laughed at were funny, and some were not, but we laughed at them together, and our individual differences melted away as though they had never existed.

Beneath the constraint of the student-teacher relationship, I was developing a similar affection for the various members of the staff. There were Miss Hutchinson, who read me my mail; Morris Frank, the owner of the first Seeing Eye dog; Mr. Debataz, a French Swiss, who was cochief of the staff of instructors; and Mr. Ebeling, the German-born executive vice-president of the school. At lunch when they distributed themselves among the students in the dining room their conversation moved easily over a variety of topics, and it was clear that the range of their interests extended far beyond their professional duties at the Seeing Eye.

But it was Mr. Northrup with whom I had the most to do and, consequently, it was he who came to symbolize for me the versatile and well-rounded personality of the staff as a whole. Daily he walked some fifteen miles with responsibility for the safety and mental well-being of eight dogs and masters, and at night he slept at the school on constant call. Yet, despite the demands of his duties, he was finding the time and energy to read Nietzsche's Thus Spake Zarathustra, which he discussed with me at dinner. I especially recall a Saturday afternoon on which he advanced the entire schedule by half an hour, in order to listen to the broadcast of the last act of Die Walküre. Because, as Mrs. Campbell had predicted, my classmates were not music lovers, or at least not Wagner lovers, he invited me into his room to share his radio. Afterward I found myself making quite a confession of my personal history and hopes for the future. In the midst of it, he let fall a comment I have never forgotten.

"You're making a fine adjustment," he said, "and we all admire and respect you for it."

To hear these words from one whom I so admired and respected was immensely flattering, but, more than that, they struck me as a first possible guaranty of my success. I had come to the Seeing Eye regarding the acquisition of a dog only as a means to an end, an impersonal tool to my private ambitions. In my fear of failure, I had sought to repress every instinct, every appetite, every tie with the past which could not reinforce me in a grim test of strength.

To my growing surprise, I had found the loving devotion of Minnie, the intellectual appeal of the course, the camaraderie of my classmates and the entire character of my experience so appealing that they had enlisted the whole of myself in the preoccupation of each moment. I had been at the school only thirteen days, but these had been thirteen days lived entirely in the present. Now for the first time, I had a reassuring glimpse of ultimate success, and I began to think, in concrete terms, of life beyond the Seeing Eye. That night I had a telephone call from a classmate, Cliffy Jones. The following Sunday was to be the first upon which we were permitted to have visitors. He said that he and some of the other boys were planning to drive over in the afternoon. I looked forward eagerly to our meeting, and fell asleep happily, quite unaware of what the morrow would bring.

The morrow brought Pearl Harbor. I had no understanding of the news. My mind oscillated between the most trivial implications of the conflict and dreamlike flights of fancy. I thought of my father—would he be made a general?—and of the German relatives he might be called upon to fight, of the screaming headlines, WAR, in huge block letters on the newsstands, of war movies I had seen or war catch up. Medium-sized jobs that take bigger chunks of time we save for weekends. That's when we clean the house, wash clothes, and shop and cook ahead. But all the big things—painting and remodeling and reupholstering, for instance—we save for vacation time. Long vacations—the teacher's luxury—help us out here. If we tried to do oversize jobs in our free hours during the week, the house would always look torn up and we'd always face half-done work staring at us. I can't think of anything worse for a family's morale."

LOOK BEFORE YOU LEAP INTO THE MACHINERY

"If you had all day at home, so a serviceman could come, it might not matter if something broke. But as far as I'm concerned, I work carefully now and read the directions first—not after a breakdown. Doing that, you don't have to call the serviceman so often." Both Rosellen and Gerry agree that without their household equipment and machinery it would be impossible to get the domestic work done in the time left over from their jobs. Their gas range, electric refrigerator and semi-automatic washer were bought in 1950, the year they bought the house. An upright vacuum cleaner has given excellent service for eleven years and an electric roaster, used for patio meals, was bought secondhand in 1948. Christmas gifts to the house included an automatic coffee maker in 1948, a portable beater in 1954 and a toaster in 1955. Two years ago they bought a steam-dry iron; next on their list is another laundry aid: a dryer.

DON'T OVERLOOK THE TREES FOR THE FOREST, EITHER

"Sometimes a job looks so big if you think of it all at once you want to throw up your hands and give up." So Rosellen never lists a week's work—too lengthy. "What I do to pace myself is set little milestones along the way. For instance, I decide I'll do the ironing Tuesday night, or by noon Saturday I'll do the washing, or whatever's on my mind. It's encouraging to think of one thing at a time." A change of pace is another part of the Dennerlein system when a job looms too big. If inside work gets tedious, she goes out to garden for a while (carnations, begonias, fuchsias and orchids show her care), comes back refreshed to the sit-down job indoors.

AS THE TWIG IS BENT— THE WHOLE TRIO'S INCLINED

"Our three daughters grew up learning to help out." That's basic in a working mother's household. "Housekeeping is never exactly fun, but we always arranged it as pleasantly as we could. When the girls were little we used to sit on the floor and powwow on who'd do what. Later we had a duty wheel, a circle with jobs around the rim, and when we spun it each girl's name would come opposite some chores. Now we put the main weekend jobs (laundry, scrubbing the kitchen and bathroom floor, vacuuming, and so on) on slips of paper and drop them in a hat. After they draw, the girls can trade if some jobs fit some schedules. But the shares come out even."

LATER TO BED OFTEN MEANS AN EXTRA TEN MINUTES' SLEEP IN THE MORNING

"Setting the breakfast table the night before actually does save us time because we're more alert when we do it. It takes five minutes to set out plates and silver and napkins and toaster and put the frying pan on the range—in the morning, with everyone half awake in the kitchen, it would be extra confusion and take longer. We don't do this setting-up job until everybody is ready to turn in because the table shows from the living room. Then when we wake up it's simply a matter of cooking the food, and it starts the day with an organized feeling."

A PENNY SPENT IS TIME EARNED

"The working wife has a different idea of economy, I think," Rosellen reflects. "It isn't always saving a few cents that counts, but smoothing your family life. For example, we could buy fresh vegetables at less cost than frozen ones, but by the time you shell peas, juice oranges or wash all that sand out of the spinach—Gerry's favorite vegetable—you're edging your way to a late dinner and a good case of irritability. I could can and preserve, too, but again it's a case of time—or giving up a walk or a swim or a picnic. So we're heavy users of frozen and canned foods, and packaged mixes and instant puddings."

PEOPLE WHO LIVE IN GLASS HOUSES CAN SAVE ON WORK

"Give me a washable surface every time," Rosellen says. "Show me anything that cleans with a sponge and I'll take it." In the Dennerlein house plastic upholstery on the dining chairs just gets wiped clean, and plastic place mats save all the work of ironing linens. When time comes to remodel there will be washable paints and wall fabrics used. Rosellen has fallen in love with wallpaper patterns she wouldn't buy. "A wife with a job just doesn't have time for the spring house cleaning her mother used to do." No-iron fabrics are slowly replacing curtains and draperies that wear out too. The house's curtains now all open flat for ironing, and the ruffled ones in the living room just need a touch-up around the edges with a steam iron.

IF IT'S WORTH DOING— THERE'S A SHORT CUT

"None of our timesavers are big or revolutionary in themselves," she sums up, "but when you add them up during a week or over a month they make a difference, so we make them a habit." All these are Dennerlein habits.

- Dishes are washed in detergent and drained dry. A two-way saving here—it cuts down dish-towel laundering.
- Paper towels and paper napkins help save on laundry too.
- Sheets and pillowcases aren't ironed but folded smooth right from the line—"You need hanging space for this so they'll dry smooth."
- A kitchen blackboard is used by all five to list items that are used up and need replacing—it saves one person from making a weekly inventory and missing obscure back-of-the-shelf needs.
- Cleaning gear is all kept in one closet so no time is wasted collecting things. "When you take turns at jobs, the work's half done if everyone knows where to find equipment. (And it cuts down excuses!)"
- Aluminum foil always gets fitted in the bottom of the oven and in the drip tray—it's easier to replace it than to clean the range.
- Everything gets put away. Gerry says, "After all, why toss a coat on a chair when you come in and come back to hang it up later? It's less work to hang it up in the first place"—a handy maxim most families would support and the working family learns because it has to.

books I had read, and of my friends at Princeton. Perhaps my first sense of real pain was the realization that they would not now be coming over, and, as the afternoon wore on, I pictured them envyingly, yearning to be with them.

By contrast the Seeing Eye seemed dull and lifeless. It was not a world unto itself but a retreat from the world. Even Minnie, nipping my hands as I patted her and wagging her tail enthusiastically, had no understanding of the staccato of Walter Winchell's voice as it came over the radio. I tried to call my parents in Fort Riley, but the telephone circuits were jammed. It was all useless. The sense of isolation I had so dreaded had come to pass. When I went to bed that night I was hopelessly alone.

In the morning the sameness of the routine had a soothing effect and, sitting with Mr. Ebeling, I was able to think about the war more calmly. How, I asked, would it affect the Seeing Eye?

"It is difficult to see into the future," he said reflectively, "but for the present our instructors are receiving deferments, and I think we shall go on pretty much as usual."

It was the simplest possible statement, but it held a confidence and sense of continuity with which I re-explored my thinking. In my subjective preoccupations I had ignored the march of world events. Here was a war. Neither the Seeing Eye nor I could participate directly in this one, but afterward we would have our work to do. For the Seeing Eye, there would be blinded veterans, needing guide dogs. For me, there would be other young men, requiring a different sort of education. I wanted to teach and I wanted to write, and whatever the subject matter of my writing and teaching, my experience here would inevitably form an important part of its content. The road to the future was a long one and filled with uncertainty, but I should be traveling it with Minnie, and uncertainty was just that which we had been learning to accept.

With the exception of my brother-in-law, who remained in California awaiting orders overseas, we were all back at the farm over the holidays. The day before Christmas, we drove down to my grandfather's, where nearly twenty members of the clan gathered to celebrate. Under the pressure of the war there was a peculiar poignancy in our traditional festivities, but I felt an additional sense of novelty as I introduced Minnie, described the training at the Seeing Eye and told of my experiences with the air of a long-absent son who, having run away to sea, returns to his own fireside to regale the stay-at-homes with tales of distant lands and strange adventures. I was aglow with the pride of an experience distinctly my own, and in the joy of home-coming I had to share it with others.

Yet less than twenty-four hours after our return to Litchfield I had embarked upon another adventure.

At about quarter to eleven in the morning I set off with Minnie for our daily walk. We had crossed the bridge and were about a hundred yards beyond it when a car drew up and stopped.

"Hi, Pete." It was a girl I had known that summer. "I've brought along an old friend to meet you. Peter Putnam, this is Durinda Dobbins. Durinda Dobbins, Peter Putnam."

"Hi, Peter Putnam."

"Hi, Durinda Dobbins."

We all laughed, a little embarrassed, perhaps, by the self-consciousness of youth.

"Are we interrupting your walk?"

"Not at all." I said. "But why don't we all take a walk? It's a wonderful day for it."

We did all take a walk, a long walk, three and one half miles, and it was a wonderful day for it. A bright winter sun had nearly thawed the recent snow, and the wind, which was brisk in gusts, had a quality of spring softness. But the springlike quality of the day had nothing to do with the fact that, before we had gone halfway, I was thoroughly smitten with Durinda Dobbins. What makes anyone fall in love? I liked her honest, energetic stride, which did not lag behind Minerva's rapid pace. I liked her laugh, the gusto of her conversation. I liked the sound of her low, husky voice which carried clearly through the fitful bluster of the winter wind.

We talked while striding along the muddy miles; and later, drinking beer before the fire, I formed a vivid impression of the girl with the husky voice and the infectious laugh.

She was a sophomore at Smith in the same class with three girls I had known at Mantoloking. She loved the Jersey shore where she had spent summers when her family owned a house in Bay Head. She had been to Princeton once, but I did not recognize the name of the boy who had invited her.

But my growing sense of kinship with Durinda Dobbins went far beyond our common acquaintance with persons or places. Here, I somehow knew, without knowing why, was a girl who loved life honestly, directly, and for no reason at all, as I had come to love it.

When she had gone, I fed Minnie and took her out to the driveway. Mechanically I followed her around on the leash as she sniffed at the ground, but my thoughts were all of Durinda. I wished I could see how she looked. That's a girl I think I could marry! I thought.

It is difficult to convey the stunning impact of this idea. During the high-school and college years I had felt spasms of infatuation for half a dozen girls. Around each of them I had constructed a dream world of sensuous, idyllic and romantic fantasies, but even in the wildest soarings of my imagination I had been conscious that they were fantasies only, and never was able to entertain even the most fugitive illusion of marriage. It was not that the objects of my infatuation were inconceivable as wives, but that I was inconceivable as a husband. Having no vision of the future, I could not imagine sharing it with anyone. The conclusion that I was incapable of love had been central to my total disenchantment with life. Now all that was changed. In the space of two hours I had discovered a girl I felt sure I could love.

Even if Durinda was not The Girl, the fact that there could be A Girl, any girl, was reason enough to marvel. The more I thought about it, the more I was convinced that, had I met this same girl a year before, there would have been no such response. Love meant giving of yourself and you could not give yourself as a spiritual virgin because you had no real self to give. What had happened was fantastic, yet it was grounded in the unshakable reality of my experience of self-discovery.

And suppose that Durinda was The Girl—what a fairy tale it was! What a labyrinth I had followed to this appointed meeting at a particular time and place. I had been born in Georgia in 1920, and for twenty-one years I had traveled around the United States and Europe. Our paths might never have crossed, or might have crossed before. We could have met in Bay Head in 1928, in Princeton in 1939, or in any one of a dozen other places. Indeed, perhaps we had met, but God or fate or destiny had somehow reserved the moment of recognition for the morning of December 27, 1941, on a muddy road in Litchfield.

On our third and last meeting before she went back to Smith, she came over for an afternoon walk. My parents tried to keep her for supper, too, but her family had planned a farewell dinner in Woodbury. She left with the promise that, if she could get away without hurting their feelings, she would come back. My heart sank, but two hours later she burst through the door, laughing and pointing out what "a truly remarkable girl" she was to have bathed, changed, eaten and driven over thirty miles on snow-covered roads in so short a time. I agreed enthusiastically, and throughout the remainder of a ridiculous and wonderful evening my admiration grew. We drove to a bowling alley in Torrington, where I threw a nearly unbroken succession of gutter balls, and afterward to two or three different taverns where we drank beer, danced to the jukeboxes and talked incessantly. The directness of her approach to whatever we did gave her true style, and her irresistible charm was that she had so much fun. Her honesty made it impossible not to be completely honest with her, and when we discussed my blindness I found it natural to tell her of the suicide attempt. She was surprised, interested and sympathetic, but neither shocked nor morbidly curious. She seemed to recognize that I had mentioned it simply to clear the ground of any misunderstanding.

When we got back to the farm my family had gone to bed, and we sat on the floor before the fire listening to my Jerome Kern records. We were silent for the most part, but I felt very close to her, and when at last she rose to go, and we stood hesitating on the front steps, I summoned the courage to attempt a good-night kiss. Almost reluctantly, in the fear of appearing awkward, I reached out my arms to her and, laughing, she bent forward to my rescue, honestly, simply, the way she did everything else.

A minute later she was gone, and I was standing with Minnie on the hard-packed snow of the driveway, listening to the sound of the car, whining into second gear, as its wheels spun and caught on the frozen ruts of the hill and imagining the truly remarkable girl, leaning forward, straight-backed at the wheel, smiling at the challenge of the slippery road.

I could never have reconstructed the events of the next few days without the material evidence of a letter to Durinda. Even after reading and rereading it, I cannot fit together all the pieces of the puzzle, but I do remember the circumstance in which I composed it, sitting alone in the living room with the typewriter before me on the coffee table. My sister was giving the children their supper in the kitchen. The rest of the house was deserted. My mother was driving my brother back to school and my father had gone to Princeton. I had just completed a seven-mile walk with Minnie, who now lay dozing at my feet. It had been bitter cold outside, and I had lit the living-room fire, placed the love duet from Tristan on the phonograph, and poured myself a glass of brandy. Yet despite the reassuring warmth of the fire and the music and the brandy, I was shivering with inner dread.

Through most of the letter I concealed it beneath a stream of trivial banter, but toward the end it showed above the surface flippancy. "I was going to Princeton today to get reentered," I wrote, "but evidently my father wanted to say something to the little men in dear old Nassau Hall that was not for my unsullied ears, so here I am, with egg on my face, waiting to see what the results will be."

Even now, reading these seemingly lighthearted lines is enough to plunge me deep into the mood of panic and frustration I then felt. I can recall nothing of the electrifying letter from the Princeton authorities, which had requested a personal interview with my father, except that it threw serious doubts on the possibility of my immediate return to Princeton, and it was, I think, because this augured the deadliest peril to my whole future that I can remember so little else. The promise of the year just beginning consisted in its challenge, and the challenge could not be met, nor the promise fulfilled, except at Princeton.

Honor means that you are too proud to do wrong; pride means that you will not own you have done wrong.

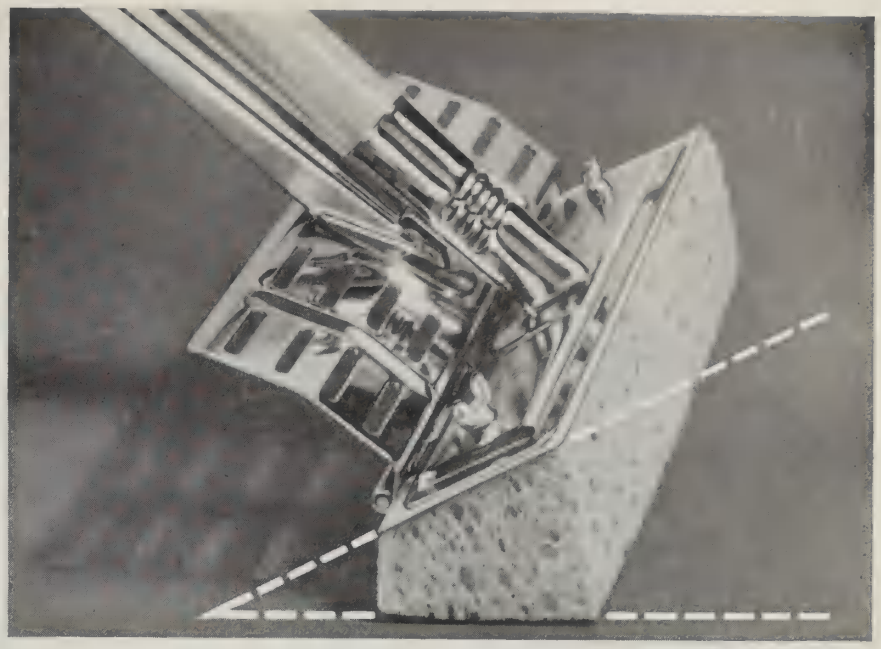
Charles Scribner's Sons.

To begin with, there was Minnie. When I left the Seeing Eye, Mr. Ebeling had warned me that my adjustment to Minnie could not be considered firmly established for at least six months. For that period we would be on a sort of probation, and Litchfield was an inadequate proving ground. For miles around the farm, the roads had no sidewalks, curbs or well-defined intersections to act as landmarks and on our very first walk together we had been lost for nearly two hours. I could take practice walks in Litchfield or Torrington, but I had to be driven there, and although this might be acceptable for a few days it would be intolerable over a long period. To make a success of Minnie I needed the familiar terrain of the campus, the familiar routine of college life and, above all, a purpose toward which we could work together.

And then there was Durinda. For a short time, it had been rather amusing to find the usual role of boy meets girl reversed, to have her take me out, to drive me home again, but this could not go on forever. Granted the independence of college, I could invite her for a weekend, meet her at the train, take her to games and dances. In Litchfield I would be helpless. There would be nothing to do with Minnie, nothing to do with Durinda, nothing to do with myself.

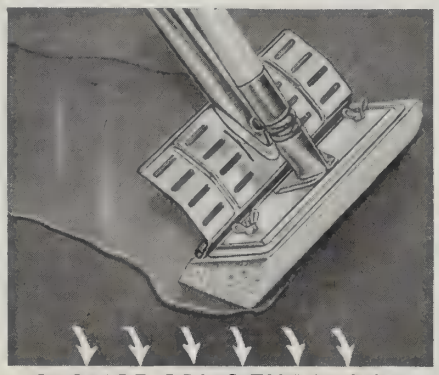
From this distance, it is possible to reason differently. There are no conditions too difficult for a Seeing Eye dog, and Minnie and I could have learned to work in Litchfield. I might have visited Durinda in Northampton or met her in New York. Finally, forced back into myself on the farm, I might have begun the writing that was one goal of my ambition. But I had been too long in the process of building another sort of vision of the future. That future led through Princeton, and to deny it was unthinkable.



My reaction was to deny the denial. I was already doing so in my closing lines to Durinda. "Write me at Princeton sometime," I concluded, "and tell me whether my Mantoloking sweethearts still pine for me." For all their surface unconcern, the words expressed a passionate intensity of defiance. By the time my father had returned to report on his interview my denial was so complete that I cannot recall a word he said. I did not hear his words because I would not hear of them. I ignored the clear fact that the Princeton authorities had never committed themselves to my readmittance; I had already determined that my only recourse was to return to Princeton and to override every objection by direct frontal assault.

The meeting with Dean Gauss is clearly etched on my memory. I was sitting in the same office in which we had faced each other two months before. The dean sat behind his desk, speaking in the same measured tones, and I pictured the same thoughtful lines on the well-remembered face, half silhouetted against the north light of the window at his back, but at the moment the voice of Dean Gauss was the voice of doom. He was saying that he and his colleagues had taken my application for readmittance under serious advisement. It was their considered opinion that my return to Princeton at this time would be premature. Doctor York, the chief of the infirmary, was particularly concerned lest I should undertake a program too ambitious for my physical and psychological well-being, and they all agreed that it would be best for me to spend some months in a school for the blind, where I might be taught helpful techniques for study and general rehabilitation. After that, if I wished, I might renew my application for readmittance to college.

I ought to have been far better prepared to hear these words than I had been for Doctor Dunnington's verdict, but my rejection of them was violent. Doctor Dunnington's diagnosis had been a shock, but it had been a simple statement of a scientific fact over which neither of us had any control. This had all the impact of an arbitrary judgment—a judgment which ignored the real facts. I was the only fact that counted, and I was not going to blind school. I was going to return to Princeton. Indeed, I had returned. I had already moved my furniture into 231 Walker Hall, had already slept one night there in my own bed, had already arranged for the delivery there of Minnie's daily ration of meat. These were the facts, and each of them denied the slightest possibility of truth in what Dean Gauss was saying.



Fortunately, I brought more than indignation to my argument, and fortunately, too, my indignation was not directed personally at anyone. I went over the reasoning of our previous interview, from rooming arrangements to methods of study, but this was only a preface. It was Minnie who was my trump card. For the next six months, it was absolutely essential that Minnie and I should live and work in familiar surroundings that only Princeton could offer. Perhaps there was something even more important. Looking back, I think it was the contagion of my personal conviction of rightness that loomed up larger than any logic into the keen vision of Dean Gauss.

"Peter," he said when I had finished, "I'll tell you what I'm going to do. If you can persuade Doctor York of the validity of your argument, I shall recommend to the committee that you be allowed to return to Princeton for the spring term on the un-der-stand-ing"—he separated each syllable for emphasis—"that it be on a tri-al ba-sis on a strict-ly reduced ac-a-dem-ic sched-ule."

I lost no time in making my way to the office of Doctor York. There, trembling inwardly, I repeated my conversation with Dean Gauss. When I emerged into the January sunlight, weak-kneed but exultant, it was with the assurance that I should receive formal acceptance of my application for readmittance at the next meeting of the committee.

Because classes were not to begin for two weeks, I had time to orient myself to my new surroundings. The suite I was to share with six roommates was comprised of four bedrooms and two living rooms on the third floor of Walker Hall. Minnie and I were to have a bedroom to ourselves, just to the right of the staircase which wound up from the ground floor and directly opposite the lavatory. I arranged my furniture in geometric patterns, the bureau next to the closet and across from the bed, the Talking Book machine on the floor beside the easy chair, the desk before the windows. I hung my clothes in the closet, and even my ties on a rack, in a certain order, which I was careful never to disarrange. It soon became relatively easy to find things within this neat and simple order. It was far more difficult to orient myself in the living rooms on the opposite side of the stair well, for these were cluttered with the souvenirs and furniture that seven different owners had been collecting for four years. I had to thread my way cautiously through the chairs and sofas, rickety standing lamps, and end tables piled high with bric-a-brac.

At the same time I was working hard with Minnie. In addition to the half-mile walks to the Cottage Club for meals, I took her for daily practice outings in order to renew my acquaintance with the campus. We had our difficulties, but it was infinitely preferable to Litchfield, and at the end of a week I felt sure that we would be able to find our way to classes. Minnie, who had eaten poorly and shown signs of general nervousness during the first days, developed a ravenous appetite and slept contentedly through the night on the chain at the end of my bed.

I had signed up for the two courses to which my reduced schedule restricted me and hired three student readers, when I received a letter from Durinda at Smith. It could not have arrived at a more opportune moment. I wired her that afternoon an invitation for the coming weekend. It was the last before the opening of classes and I was in a mood to celebrate.

Late Saturday afternoon I met Durinda at the station, and we began the ritual pattern of a winter weekend at Princeton: a party in the room, dinner at the Nass, a hockey game at the rink, and beer, singing and a sandwich afterward. We talked with an animation that derived from unwrapping personal enthusiasms for each other to admire. Whether these enthusiasms were already shared or private, they drew us together. She promised that she would read F. Scott Fitzgerald and I warmed to her insistence that she could teach me to ski. Her attitude toward my blindness was refreshing. She accepted it as a perfectly natural and interesting problem.

"I'm going to teach you good manners," she laughed, as we sat on the sofa in the room. "I've got a cigarette in my mouth. See if you can light it by the sound of my voice." I tried it. "A little higher. Hold it. Good."

Sunday afternoon, one of the girls who had a car offered us a ride to New York, and, unwilling to have our weekend over so soon, we accepted. As we sat alone together in the Biltmore cocktail lounge, talking above the tinkling laughter, the deeper surf noise of the conversation, the strains of the string ensemble and the occasional ominous rumble of the trains in the station below, I sought to postpone the moment when one of those trains should carry her off to Northampton. I suggested dinner and a later train. Durinda demurred for a few minutes, then laughed.

"We're being very bad, you know," she said. "Have you got some change? I have to call my housemother."

A half hour later, after a taxi ride and an outing in Washington Square for Minerva, we were sitting in the Café Lafayette with the golden hours still before us and the excitement still growing. The Lafayette had been my grandfather's favorite restaurant, and he had taken me there as far back as I could remember. Everything went perfectly. Nicki, the headwaiter, recognized me, called me "Monsieur Pete," and was delighted to bring Minnie a pound of hamburger and a bowl of water. I chose my grandfather's favorite meal—Moules Marinières, Filet of Sole, Vin Blanc and Broccoli Hollandaise—and ordered a bottle of Café Monopole, 1934, for all the world as if I really knew something about wine.

"All I can say is men are bigger fools than I thought."

Over coffee it finally, inevitably, slipped out. Feeling it coming, knowing that I could not stop it, I tried to measure my words carefully.

"It's a crazy thing to say," I said slowly, "and I know I haven't any right to say it, but I'm pretty sure I'm in love with you, and I think, maybe, someday, we ought to get married."

The sound of the words, the reckless, clumsy words, spoken so slowly and deliberately, wrung my conscience.

"I'm sorry," I apologized. "I shouldn't have said that, and I don't think we should talk about it. I just had to tell you what I was thinking. It's such a nice thing to think about."

Durinda squeezed my hand. "It is a nice thing to think about," she said.

That was all. We did not refer to it again that evening, but the memory of the words hung there enveloping us in a magical intimacy that did not require further articulation to live and grow.

Alone, on the train back to Princeton, I had plenty of time to think. The train was the 12:40, jolting to a stop every few minutes with the regularity of a trolley. The car was terribly overheated and a good half of its occupants were recent draftees, on weekend passes, returning to Fort Dix. I hunched close to the window with one foot perched on the radiator and the other spread wide to protect Minnie, who lay curled up on the littered floor.

My life had passed into a new phase. I no longer thought or reasoned about what it might be possible to do. I acted, spontaneously, almost without thinking, on what it was impossible not to do. The authority for such action was a personal experience that had imbued with flint-and-steel reality the airy fantasy of a fairy tale. My life was the fairy tale and I was driven on without conscious volition, from one miraculous adventure to another. In nine months there had been three of them and each had forced me on by its own logic.

Having fallen underneath the enchantment of Durinda, I could no more withhold declaration of my love than could the prince restrain the impulse to stoop and kiss the Sleeping Beauty. Step by step I felt I was following the path of an inevitable destiny.

"Princeton Junction! Princeton Junction!" sounded the chant of the tired conductor from a different level of reality.

I rose, stiff-legged, bracing myself in the aisle, while Minnie shook her harness gratefully and wagged her tail. The whine of the air brakes sounded above the rattle of the swaying car and we shivered to a stop. I picked up Minnie's harness and gave her the command of forward.

"Atta good girl!" I said.

The notion that I was living in a fairy tale may seem hopelessly romantic, but fairy tales are only the poetic embodiments of underlying psychological realities. They are neither true nor false in themselves and the truths we read into them are integrally connected with the realities of our personal experience. The truth about Cinderella is that she won the love of the prince not by fairy godmothers, pumpkins or glass slippers, but through a loving and self-sacrificing heart, and only the same character could maintain her "happily" ever after. Should she, in her delight at her good fortune, shut herself up in her palace boudoir reading French novels and eating sweetmeats, we know that the time is not far off when her plump little feet will be unable to squeeze into the crystal slippers and the prince will inevitably spend more and more time in hunting, jousting and business trips. Happy endings have to be won anew each day.

This was the challenge that faced me now and had been facing me right along. The inspiring devotion of Minnie was contingent upon a thousand irksome duties of care and feeding, currying and brushing and the closest attention to the many details of our working lives.

The winning of Durinda depended upon the tedious and patient construction of a future which might someday be large enough to embrace us both.

The conviction that my period of probation was something far wider and deeper than anything Dean Gauss or Mr. Ebeling had implied lent an extraordinary emotional intensity to the most prosaic episodes of my daily routine, and the very feverishness of my ambition seemed to make it inevitable that it should, from time to time, burn itself out, to be succeeded by a chill of panic at the prospect of failure.

The most irritating manifestation of this phenomenon was in the havoc it wrought on my sleeping habits. Having climbed into bed, thoroughly worn out by the efforts of the day, I would come awake with electric suddenness. Sleep would not return and finally, deciding that there was more peace in action than in enforced inaction, I arose, pulled on a coat and trousers over my pajamas and settled myself at my desk.

Sometimes I made lists of errands for the following day, punching them out on my Braille slate—razor blades to be bought, a suit to be cleaned, a dentist appointment to be arranged. As I wrote I planned the itinerary for Minnie and myself. The back way into the student tailor shop was closer, but unless a delivery truck was idling in the driveway to give the direction of the turn, it would be easier to find the flagstone walk of the front entrance. The dentist's phone number was 796. To have it written down eased the pressure on my memory. Afterward I might write for a new Talking Book or pull out my Braille notes of the previous day's lecture. I began to feel drowsy at last and to notice the chill in the silent room, but I finished the page before crawling back into bed. The inner fire was out, I was soon asleep.

Nothing will ruin the country if the people will undertake its safety; and nothing can save it if they leave that safety in any hands but their own.

DANIEL WEBSTER

The alarm clock awakened me at half past six. I was tired after my night prowlings, but as I washed and shaved my energy revived. There was a spot on my right cheekbone which I often missed. Durinda had remarked on it, and scraping at it now made me happy in the thought of her. Back in my room, I dressed slowly while I listened to the Talking Book. I was reading some short stories of Chekhov which I liked but was not sure I understood, and so I read them all twice.

I had carefully avoided arousing Minerva until I was ready to take her out. Now, as I unhooked her from her chain with several pats and "Atta good girl," she licked my face and dived into the harness I held in front of her. Then, wagging her tail eagerly, she led me down the stairs and out to the stretch of lawn where I took her four times a day.

At first, I had considered these outings only a necessary nuisance, but they soon became pleasant interims of solitary meditation. During these morning outings as the cool air dissipated the last shreds of sleep, I was apt to be thinking about the piano.

The piano occupied an important niche in my life that spring. For years I had had a longing to play, but it was not until after blindness that I found the determination to attempt lessons. Even before the term began I had gone to see John Dielhenn, a recent Princeton graduate, who taught many of the students. When I asked rather hesitantly whether he would be willing to accept me as a pupil, his response was unexpectedly enthusiastic. There were dozens of fine blind pianists, he said. He had enjoyed teaching one some years before and he would welcome the challenge of working with me.

But John Dielhenn had more than enthusiasm to offer. In the course of a few lessons, he unfolded to me what he called the psychology of the piano. Actually, it was the psychology of all learning and was based on the distinction of the subconscious from the conscious mind. The subconscious had a nearly infinite capacity. It never tired, never forgot anything, and could co-ordinate a dozen different actions simultaneously without confusion. The conscious, on the other hand, tired quickly, reembered with difficulty, and could focus on ily one thing at a time. The importance of the latively inferior conscious mind was that it as the sole means for transmitting any action the control of the subconscious. The conious mind was the recording head; the subnscious, the wax impression upon which it corded. Only perfect recording with the nscious could insure perfect reproduction. false note cut into the groove of the wax imession would play back as a false note. For is reason, the careless pianist, like the careless ath student, was apt to make the same miske over and over again.

The psychology of the piano dictated that ch piece to be played must first be broken to its component parts—melody, harmony, ngering, rhythm, the left hand, the right nd, and so on—to introduce them into the bconscious one at a time, slowly and carelly, before trying to put them all together. hn demonstrated the efficacy of this ethod a few weeks after we had begun. For ore than twenty minutes I sat before the ano without touching it, while he forced me analyze aloud every aspect of Ach, du lieber ugustin. Only when I had thought it all rough to his satisfaction did he permit me to lay it. My performance was slow and awkard, but I did not strike a single false note. I ad made a perfect recording. I had literally ought the entire thing into my mind.

This suggested electrifying possibilities, ot only for the piano but as a whole way of fe. I must learn to use my conscious mind to nalyze each problem as it arose, each shave, ch walk with Minnie, each book I read, a inute, an hour, a day at a time. It made me lerant of my painstaking progress as my finers groped across the keys and it made me lerant, too, of my other gropings in the long nd tedious process that lay ahead.

When Minnie had done sniffing her way cross the dewy grass I put on her harness and arted for the Dielhenn Music Studios. At rns or steps I concentrated on wheeling harply or stopping cleanly. Minnie tended to ut corners diagonally and to stop too far om curbs or steps for me to feel their outne with my extended right foot. These were inor failings, but I wanted no careless reording on our mutual subconscious. Despite y familiarity with the campus, there were roblems of orientation as well. At one diagnal crossing over a gravel parking area a light deviation might cause me to miss the agstone walk on the opposite side. When a ng straightaway freed me from other preccupations, I practiced facial vision. The tillness of early morning was ideal for this urpose. There was no sound-distorting wind nd none of the clamor of midday, when oices, footsteps and the bell for classes might bscure subtler distinctions of sound. Now he metal V's in my heels, striking the pavenent, echoed from the looming buildings and he trees lining the walk. But when I had rossed Nassau Street, the stillness which had acilitated facial vision on the campus became handicap. The stores had not yet opened and ave forth none of the characteristic sounds hat provided landmarks later in the day: the nipping of scissors in the barbershop, the latter of china and cutlery from Renwick's Coffee Shop, and the strains of phonograph ecords from the music store directly beneath he Dielhenn Studios. I had to guess at the umber of steps from the last curb to give Minnie the command of "Right."

Once the routine had been established in Minnie's mind, she learned to hesitate opposite the doorway, and the slackening of the forward pressure on the harness handle told me ve were nearing our destination. Inside the practice room, I congratulated her, and she esponded with enthusiasm. She seemed always to partake of my own uncertainty, and, ike a navigator who has just made a difficult andfall, to be doubly pleased at finding herelf in the proper port of call. Waving her tail, she snaked her body underneath the piano and dozed away the time until I should need her again.

After half an hour of patient stumbling hrough the scales and chord progressions of he twelve keys, I judged that my concentraion was tiring, and it was time for breakfast. The route to the club was unmistakable until the last turnoff. Cottage was the sixth in a line of clubs, perhaps three hundred yards from the last curb, down a sidewalk with no distinguishing features, and the buildings were set too far back from the street for the use of facial vision. At lunch or dinner, when there was more activity, I could count the opening and closing doors as I passed, but it was easy to miss the turn in the morning. Fortunately, there was a small lane just beyond, where telltale bits of gravel underfoot announced that I had overshot the mark. Once having missed the turn, however, it was not enough simply to locate it and go in. An improper groove had been cut, and I made Minnie repeat the turn several times over, rewarding each time with an ecstatic "Atta good girl."

When we entered the dining room, one of the dozen members present called out to me to direct me to an empty chair. I had learned to recognize most of their voices, but even when it was unnecessary I was always grateful to those who had the instinctive tact to add their names, parenthetically, to their good mornings. I felt surprisingly gregarious, partially because breakfast at the club was still a new experience. The year before, I had generally overslept it. Under my new regimen I had been up for hours, and as I started back for class with time to spare, I felt a little superior to those who straggled past me from the opposite direction.

The two courses to which I had been restricted, the European novel and Wagnerian opera, consumed only six class hours a week, and on two of the five weekdays I had no classes at all. On the classless mornings I kept busy with errands, walks, Braille, the Talking Book and piano lessons, but the lectures were a serious challenge. Despite my assurances to Dean Gauss, my ability to take notes was extremely primitive. At first I used neither punctuation nor capitalization, and was uncertain of even such simple abbreviations as the symbols for "the," "and" and "but." The dots had to be punched through the paper in reverse so as to be read on the opposite side, and this mirror writing was both slow and liable to error. Before blindness, I had been able to cover four large sheets of note paper in a closely written hand. Now I was often limited to less than fifty words a lecture, and because the misplacing of a single dot completely altered the meaning of a symbol, many of these words were meaningless hieroglyphs. But as I punched at the paper I listened with a new intensity of concentration, so as to fill in the spaces between these distorted and broken fragments. Later in my room I puzzled out their meaning and typed them into comprehensible form. The end result was far superior to the notes of the previous year, and the conscious effort of deciphering them impressed their content on my memory.

If blindness was only a qualified handicap in lectures, it was no handicap at all in preceptorials. These were small informal discussion groups to analyze the weekly reading under the guidance of a faculty preceptor. In the past they had bored me, and I had entered the discussion only enough to get by, relying upon a backlog of general knowledge to conceal the shoddiness of my preparation. Now I was fully prepared and my own experience excited new interpretations of the insights of the reading. In preceptorials through which I should have yawned the year before, I often found myself arguing hotly in defense of my deepest convictions. During the walk back to the room afterward, I relaxed to the sense impressions of the new spring: the damp smell of earth, breathing freely through the softened crust of the night's frost; the sudden chilling of the air when a cloud shadowed the radiance which a moment before had been dancing across my sensitive eyelids; the swooping rush of wings and twittering of birds. Minnie reflected my mood as fully as she had shared the tension of the earlier morning. At the sound of the tolling bell on the way to classes, the harness handle had vibrated with a driving urgency and she strained forward. Now she held herself erect and a slight vertical spring at each step made a buoyant waltz in my left hand. An insect buzzed by her head. There was a sudden twitch, and her jaws snapped.

"Did you get it, Minerv?" I asked. "Atta good girl!"

For an instant she paused, then broke stride with a playful prance. Her tail struck my leg and I had the feeling she was laughing up at me in confirmation of the beauty of the spring.

When I had dropped my Braille slate in my room, I headed over to the gym for a workout. Usually I was joined by two roommates, Matty Gault and Cliffy Jones, but I no longer depended on them for guidance. Minnie hesitated automatically before the door of my corner locker. I had learned to work its combination by counting the number of clicks as I turned the dial. Upstairs in the gym I could find my way from dumbbells to chest weights to wall bars unaided. Still, Matty and Cliffy were pleasant company. I was trying to build up to my weight and they were toughening themselves for the Army, but none of us admitted any serious motives, and the strain of our physical exertions was interspersed with a good deal of verbal horseplay.

Afterward, while Matt and Cliffy took a few laps around the indoor track, I returned to my locker and stripped for a swim in the pool. I hitched Minnie to the steel leg of the diving platform, dropped over the side, and struck out for the opposite end, touching the edge of the pool with my inside hand at each forward stroke. Minnie always whimpered uneasily at first, and I could hear her with each roll of my head, but by the end of the second lap she had quieted down. As I swam, the rhythm of my breathing became stronger, steadier and easier. My body seemed to flatten, my spine to elongate, and my whole being to immerse itself in the warm chlorinated water that trickled past my ears. By June I could swim a mile, or seventy laps, without stopping and even speed up on the last four or five. When I pulled out, Minnie licked my streaming face in a joyous welcome. My eyes smarted with the chlorine, my mouth tasted dry and my palms and soles were water-soaked and wrinkled, but when I had dressed and stepped out of the damp-smelling locker room my pores, cleansed and purified, seemed to breathe a new freshness from the spring sun.

On the good mornings I would find Bertie O'Neill waiting for me in the living room at Walker.

"Hi!" His tone was offhand. "How's the body beautiful?"

I ignored the taunt. "Well?" I asked.

"Well what?"

"You know well what! Come on, quit stalling."

"O.K., O.K., calm your libido. Yes, the mail came this morning. Yes, there was a letter for you. Yes, it was from Northampton. And, yes, I'll read it to you. Only feed your hairy companion before she has a nervous breakdown."

My hairy companion was wagging her tail excitedly, alternately sniffing at the refrigerator door and looking up at me in eager expectation. She watched my every move as I mixed a handful of meal with a half pound of raw hamburger and when I picked up the pan she bounded through the door and scrambled across the hall into the bedroom, where I gave it to her. Bert followed us, closing the door behind him, and ripped open the letter.

It was Bertie who had read me Durinda's first letter, and so it was Bertie whom I asked to read all the others. Being Bertie, he could not resist an occasional irreverent aside, but he knew when to stop, and his basic tact minimized the embarrassment of having her confidences revealed to a third party. Incongruously, the sound of his voice, so at variance with the tone of the words, seemed to heighten the impact of the incredible confession with which each letter ended. Hearing the words, I felt an overwhelming tenderness for the girl who had written them.

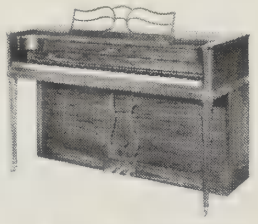
When I had taken Minnie for her midday outing, we joined the rest of the boys for the walk to the club. After lunch the others drifted

The need for creativity... never greater than today

Progress, great and necessary force that it is, is not without its penalty.

Today has fostered a trend from "do-it-yourself" to "do-less-yourself." Visual entertainment comes to the living room at the simple twist of a knob. Mother's pride, the secret family recipe, gives way to pre-cooked, jiffy meals. The craftsman's tools gather dust... ready-to-assemble kits need little more than sandpaper and glue.

In our modern, restless world the need to create... with the hands... the mind... the heart has never been greater than it is today.



How we regain the joys of self-expression—the spiritual lift born from "doing" is a matter of personal choice. We, at Baldwin, as makers of the piano, offer this popular instrument for your consideration. Here is the way to true creativity... to fulfillment... enrichment... a way to the special world of happiness that music alone attains.

But the value of piano is not merely the playing of music for diversion and enjoyment. Far more than that: piano builds poise and popularity... stimulates the mind... and brings family "togetherness" into the home.

Don't get the mistaken idea that unless you are very young or possess extraordinary talent, piano is not for you, or yours. Our new free booklet, "You're Never Too Old," tells how easily piano brings pleasure to people of all ages... from all walks of life. Your local piano teacher will be happy to tell you about new simplified methods of learning.

Just make sure the piano you buy gives you everything a piano should. We urge you to compare the Acrosonic by Baldwin with all others before you decide. Compare its exclusive Full Blow action, its lightning response. Compare its full volume—its magnificent tone. Then compare for beauty. The Acrosonic offers you a wide choice of handsome traditional and contemporary styles in the exact finish for your decor.

Decide now to bring the enjoyment of music into your life. Visit your Baldwin dealer. Or write now to: Baldwin Piano Company, Bldg. L-2, Cincinnati 2, Ohio, for a free copy of "You're Never Too Old."

ff to classes, labs, R.O.T.C. or the library to ork on their senior theses while I walked ack to the room for a nap. On the good days, eling the coolness of the sheets on my warm kin, the sudden heaviness in my lids, I rowsed off in the assurance that the details of ne morning had gone well.

But the morning I have described was typi- al of only the ideal day. There were other nornings. Plenty of them—mornings when I verslept and missed piano practice before reakfast, when I became impatient or lost vith Minnie and arrived late to classes, when ny stiff and aching fingers stumbled so far ehind the words of the lecturer that I simply ut my stylus in my pocket. Any or all of these ight seem only minor compromises with the iscipline I had laid down for myself, and yet hese limited objectives were the goal of a des- erate ambition. And although I could forgive ailure, I could not tolerate nonobservance. On the bad days my conscience would not let ne sleep.

Worn out by guilt, I dozed restlessly until a udden upward flickering of consciousness nade me aware of a peculiarly unpleasant ressure on my chest. I shifted uneasily. Then, vith a penetrating shaft of fear, I sensed that was alive and moving. A thing, a living thing, either animal nor human. I gasped for breath, earing the moan of my own voice as I strug- led to dislodge the awful thing. I wrenched ack the bedclothes and lay there panting as he horror skittered back into the darker eaches of my mind.

I swung my feet over the side of the bed and at there dizzily, supporting myself with my ands. Minnie's bed chair rattled in response the sudden movement and I stooped grate- ully to put my arms around the reassuring urry warmth of her body. I pulled on my lothes, crossed to the lavatory to splash cold vater on my face and went into the living oom, where I stood by the open window to be lose to the sounds which floated up from the ennis court below.

I wanted to talk to someone, to play jazz ecords, to go to the movies, to do anything hat would take me away from myself, but I new that there was only one solution and so, when I had sufficiently collected my thoughts, returned to my room and set to work tran- cribing the Braille fragments of a lecture on he typewriter.

Two or three afternoons a week my solitude was interrupted by the arrival of the student eaders. All of them read very well, and read- ng aloud was far more thorough than ordi- nary reading because it prohibited uncon- cious skimming. Still, the presence of another uman being imposed an annoying screen be- ween myself and the author. It robbed me of oth the intimacy and the timelessness of or- dinary reading, for I could meet my authors only by appointment, as it were, and through an interpreter. Books which you read to your- self are timeless because they will repeat to you with infinite patience precisely the same thoughts and words at any time at which you choose to look into them. In depending on a reader I was under a constant pressure of time and I was forced to swallow at one gulp thoughts which I should have preferred to digest at a slower rate.

Under this pressure it was maddening to find myself subject to periodic fits of drowsi- ness which obscured whole paragraphs and pages of the reading, due in part, I suppose, to the general fatigue of my system and, in part, to the rising and falling rhythm of sound which lulled me into a sort of trance. There were many problems, but for all its disadvan- tages, this method of study was infinitely pref- erable to the erratic working habits of the pre- ceding year.

It was a relief after the long afternoon in the smoke-filled room to feed Minnie and take her down to the lawn behind the tennis courts. When she had finished, I put her through the daily ritual of obedience exercises and pulled her currycomb and brush from my pocket. Minnie gave a little prance at the mere sight of these tools and braced herself with sensuous enjoyment as I scrubbed the metal teeth of the comb back and forth through her thick coat. Upstairs I washed my hands, put on a tie and joined the other boys in the living room. Our conversation at these times was dominated by a sort of good-natured heckling of one an- other. As I look back, it seems to me we shared a tacit agreement that no one should be allowed to take either himself or the world too seriously. We held nothing sacred, and after the emotional intensity of my day I welcomed the display of our implacable irreverence.

I relaxed under the convivial banter through- out dinner and, if it were not one of those three or four evenings a week devoted to fur- ther reading, drifted along with it to the movies uptown, in the taproom at the Nass or in a "bull session" back in the room.

But whatever the schedule, the good eve- nings ended with a different and more serious sort of communion. This was expressed in typing a letter to Durinda. With the sublime egotism of one who knows he is loved, I poured out my heart in the conviction that everything I had thought or felt that day would be of absorbing interest to her. My let- ters were so many confessions—confessions of past failures, of present weaknesses and of faith in the future. But the most wonderful of all my confessions was contained in the simple statement, "I love you," for, of all the words

A FORWARD STEP

An expert committee of the World Health Organization has classified the United States as a "backward country" in the provision of maternity care for all. One of the chief reasons why the United States is a backward country obstetrically is the crucial shortage of professional workers.

At this point the well-educated certified nurse-midwife comes into her own. Her educational background and experience qualify her to take professional leadership in the management of normal pregnancy and labor under medical supervision and in the education of expectant parents and nurses. Last winter we published three stories on the twenty years' experience of the Maternity Center Association in the education of the certified nurse-midwife. The graduates of the Association's school in New York and of the other two schools conducted by the Frontier Nursing Service in Kentucky and the Catholic Maternity Institute in New Mexico have demonstrated their capabilities in the provision of high-standard maternity care. A number of consultants in maternal and child health to the Federal and state governments and the World Health Organization are nurse-midwives. Maternity-nursing services in important hospitals are being directed by nurse-midwives. The time is therefore ripe for the recognition of this new (to the United States) profession. An important step toward this recognition was recently taken in Kansas City with the establishment of the American College of Nurse-Midwifery. The editors of BRIEFS wish this new specialist organization success in its efforts to improve the standard of care for all American mothers and babies.

he language, these were the three that I never dreamed I should ever be able to efore I went to bed I took Minnie for her outing. It was the time when I always felt est to her. Our communion was too ply organic to be expressed at the level of ds, yet my love for the dog and my love the girl had something in common. On the ace, Minnie could be defined as a tool for use, but the love which alone made this function overflowed any such definition. ad forged a bond of sympathy so strong Minnie's happiness was dependent upon own. I owed my happiness, not only to elf but to Minerva, because she loved me. he same sense, I owed it also to Durinda, y family and to my friends, and the notion everything that I did for myself I was also g for them relieved my pursuit of happi- of its stark subjectivism.

She could have no understanding he chords on the piano, the words of the ures or the splash- in the pool, but she ned to understand er than anyone their per meaning for my therefore, for her piness. Following over the grass ough the balm of the t air, I burned with itude for the gift of a love.

I felt reasonably fident of having done well, but it was not il the posting of my grades several days r that I discovered I had received the high- marks of my college career.

he following day I had a summons from office of the Dean of the College. I was wondering half guiltily what this ominous tation foreboded when I reported to Dean ss' office.

I called you up here, Peter," the dean an- nced conversationally, "because I wanted discuss your work. How are you getting " as embarrassed, but I smiled back at the s of sly amusement I pictured around the ners of his direct gaze.

At any rate," he continued, "we shall be py to have you and your good Minnie back h us for as long as you wish to continue r combined educations."

My admiration for the dean's great personal grity helped to muffle my self-satisfaction ing the remainder of the interview, but the re I thought about it afterward, the more nificant that interview became. It was not a ning point; the point of turning had been my return to Princeton, and the road still lay straight ahead. It only marked the route, like a signpost, confirming the direction previously taken, but the relief with which I greeted it forced me to admit that, for all the confident egoism of the past months, I had been inwardly uncertain. I had been traveling into an unknown future, and even graduation from the Seeing Eye had not guaranteed future success with Minnie. Now the new self I had found myself to be had both a future and a past. It was a brief past, to be sure, but it marked a reassuring continuity of progress, and Dean Gauss was a reliable signpost.

Events were moving fast that spring, and I did not have time to write Durinda the news because she was coming down the following weekend for house parties. That Saturday night I was sitting alone on the terrace at the Cottage Club. After dinner I had gone back to the room to change into evening clothes and I was now waiting for Durinda to come downstairs. It had been raining, and the bushes below the terrace still dripped moistly, but the air had cleared and the first strains of the orchestra floated out through the open doors of the big living room. With one part of my mind I followed the chord changes of All the Things You Are, which I was just learning to play. With the other, I pictured how it all must look: the light from the Japanese lanterns above the outside dance floor reflected in the beaded crystals on the shiny leaves, the cool green of the grass stained with huge trapezoids of yellow light from the windows of the club, the looming darkness of the trees beyond, and through them the bulk of Palmer Stadium, glimmering faintly in the fugitive light of the clouded moon. I heard high-heeled footsteps behind me and when Minnie got up, wagging her tail, I knew it was Durinda.

I wish I could describe it exactly as it happened, but I cannot remember the words we spoke then. Perhaps it does not matter because the words we really speak do not make good dialogue. Anyway, it happened. Durinda sat down beside me and said she had something to tell me. She had been thinking seriously, she said, and had come to a decision. She had decided that she was ready to accept my proposal of marriage. Her voice was very low and serious.

I kissed her then and afterward, to cover up my feeling, I asked teasingly whether this was the first time she had come to that decision. She laughed. No, she said, but she had known that this would be so perfect a setting that she had postponed telling me until tonight. We both laughed then, but I knew what she meant. It was a perfect setting.

We sat there for a while, holding hands and listening to the music in a dazed happiness. Then I thought of something. I got out my watch and felt its face.

"Do you know what time it is?" I asked.

"No."

"A little after ten-thirty. Do you know what day this is?"

Durinda thought for a moment. "May second."

"Right," I said. "In just an hour and a half it will be just one year from the day of the accident." I laughed and added, "It's been quite a year. Quite a year."

It was a trite remark, but for once I was not trying to analyze my thoughts and I left my feelings to themselves. There were no chills and fever. Only a wonderful incandescent glow around the words, "Quite a year. Quite a year."

SUDDENLY APRIL

By BARBARA SHOOK

Now suddenly April
Totters the heart
With a twist of tulip
And a woman's art.
Banners of brightness
Soften the sedge,
Fern fronds uncurl
By the water's edge;
While frail jonquil fists
Brave their own birth
'Twixt snow-tufted clumps
Of still-cold earth.
And high on the limb
Of a bare-branched tree
One robin sings—
Just for me.

The danger in waiting for your child to outgrow pimples

by MARCELLA HOLMES NOTED BEAUTY AUTHORITY
(former beauty editor of "Glamour" magazine)

Of all the letters that reach a beauty editor's desk, there are none so urgent as those from adolescent girls with pimples. That's why I want to alert mothers to the double dangers of this problem. Psychologists tell us pimples undermine poise and self-confidence, can cause permanent damage to a child's personality. Skin specialists warn that acne-type pimples, if neglected, can leave permanent scars.

Fortunately, today you can help your child with a modern, scientific pimple medication that really works. It's called CLEARASIL. In doctors' tests on 202 patients, 9 out of every 10 cases were completely cleared up or definitely improved while using CLEARASIL.

Oil in pores helps pimples grow and thrive. So don't use skin creams which contain oils pimples 'feed' on. Use a true oil-absorbing medication—CLEARASIL, which helps remove these oils, actually 'starves' pimples.

CLEARASIL is skin-colored to end embarrassment immediately. Greaseless, fast-drying, antiseptic . . . it's guaranteed to work for you, as it did in doctors' tests, or money back. Only 69¢ at all drug counters (economy size 98¢).

Special Offer: Send 15¢ in coins or stamps for generous trial size of CLEARASIL to Eastco, Inc., Box 12PO, White Plains, N.Y. Exp. May 31, 1957.

WHO ARE AMERICA'S TEN RICHEST MEN?

her companies, dealing in everything from ndy to chemicals. He has vast gas holdings, ttle ranches, a chain of drugstores. In 1954 e teamed up with his lifelong friend, Clint furchison, to help Robert R. Young get conol of the New York Central Railway. This icked him for $20 million, but the investment eemed sound; and anyway, Murchison anted him to.

Richardson, a large, barrel-bodied man with hinning brown hair, a rolling walk and a exas drawl, has been a bachelor all his life. Whenever he is teased about this, which is ften, he remarks amiably, "Why, I been hinkin' about a wife for forty years now." Vomen have been chasing him in vain for ecades. "They're all wantin' a landin' field, ut mine's fogged in," is his permanent omment.

Evidently he likes bachelor life—and as one ess affluent observer commented: "When ou're that rich, you don't need a helpmeet."

For thirty-five years Richardson has lived in otels or clubs, and for the last sixteen years e has occupied the same two rooms in the Fort Worth Club. He is partial to the cowboy-ndian-soldier paintings of the Old West by Charles Russell and Frederic Remington, and is walls are decorated with their art. The enter of his bedroom is occupied by an island f suitcases, each packed with clothes proper o hot, medium or cold climate. Whenever he vants to go anywhere in a hurry, he throws hree clean shirts into the proper suitcase, and e's off—usually in one of the two fifteen-assenger DC-3 planes which he owns.

Richardson's day begins at 6:30 A.M., with a elephone call from Murchison in Dallas. Leaning back against the rumpled pillows, he alks million-dollar deals, and lights the first igarette of the day. He smokes five packs a day, but only an inch of each cigarette, and he never inhales. Breakfast at 8:30 is a raw egg in orange juice. By 10 A.M. he is in his office downtown. He prefers doing business by telephone rather than by secretary. And he would rather listen than talk. "You ain't learnin' nothin' when you're talkin'" is one of his favorite maxims.

January and February Richardson spends with friends in Southern California. Midsummer finds him with the Murchison family in La Jolla, California, where he spends every day at the Del Mar Race Track. Richardson and Murchison own the track jointly, and claim they devote some of its profits to an organization called "Boys, Inc." aimed at combating juvenile delinquency. Richardson's other philanthropies, if any, have not been publicized, although he is said to be tight with money in little ways and generous in big. He once, however, gave a coming-out party for his niece Nancy Ann Smith, in which 10,000 bunches of grapes were used in the decorations. One of his gifts to friends is a gold money clip bearing an oil derrick outlined in diamonds above a diamond-studded initial.

November and December, Richardson lives and hunts on St. Joseph Island in the Gulf of Mexico, enjoying his glass-walled home with its furniture handmade from driftwood and its deliberate lack of telephones. The island, which he owns, has 32,000 acres stocked with cattle, and a wild area stocked with deer, quail, duck, turkey and geese.

In 1937 Mr. Richardson entertained the late President Franklin D. Roosevelt on the island and in 1949 he was host to Dwight Eisenhower. Both Murchison and Richardson have claimed to be Democrats, but both supported Eisenhower—in 1952 Richardson went to Paris to urge the then NATO military commander to run for President. Since the election he has dined frequently at the White House, but he does not disclose the subject of the conversations.

Another favorite retreat is the Koon Kreek Club, located in a millionaire-exclusive wilderness near Athens, Texas. There the fellow magnates can lie around in old sports clothes, fishing, playing poker and enjoying a rugged masculine life, far from all those eager women.

Both Richardson and Murchison seem to have a lot of fun together, hunting, fishing or following the horses. "They are both nice guys," one Dallas oilman remarked. "They have the simplest, most innocent desire in the world—to make money. All they want is more."

So, apparently, does Arthur Vining Davis. At 81 this spry gentleman retired from active participation in the affairs of the Aluminum Company of America, and began building a new career and a new fortune in Florida. So successful have his efforts been that now, close to 90, he can count a $450 million pile and call himself (according to most estimates) America's second-richest man. He is still going strong, buying up properties and companies, although no one knows quite why. Mr. Davis does not like publicity, and has rarely been interviewed.

Property owning is evidently in his blood, for his ancestors held considerable property in New England in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. "His forebears were so strictly Anglo-Saxon and New England," his sister once said, "that you may well introduce him as a 'Yankee' pure and simple, and be done with it."

Born in Sharon, Massachusetts, on May 30, 1867, Davis was the son of a Congregationalist minister. His father saw to it that the boy was trained in the habits of New England thrift and hard work, and gave him a good education; he attended Roxbury Latin school in Boston and was graduated from Amherst College in 1888, a Phi Beta Kappa.

After that, he was on his own, and he made the most of expanding America. In Pittsburgh that same year he joined an industrial firm which a few years later was to begin turning out America's first commercial aluminum. At $14 a week, wearing overalls, he opened packing cases, kept books, answered letters and supervised a thirteen-hour shift—seven days a week. (When aluminum went into production, Davis gave the first stew pan ever made to his mother. She used it for many years in her cooking—and the pan is still preserved.) In 1891 he became general manager, and during the next half century he pioneered Alcoa into what is now one of the world's richest corporations. He is still chairman of the board, a director of the Mellon National Bank and Trust Company and half a dozen others.

His real life, however, is in Florida, although he will fly from time to time to New York or Pittsburgh to take care of financial tag ends involving only a few millions or so. But the acquisition of property and business, particularly in Dade County—which means Miami and its suburbs—is his current absorption. He owns one eighth of the county, and many of its banks, hotels and skyscrapers. "Arthur Vining Davis is a large body of money surrounded by Dade County," quipped one observer.

In a forty-five-day period last year Mr. Davis bought the lavish Boca Raton Club and its lands, an airline, a downtown office building, a large cattle ranch, and 200,000 acres of land on the Isle of Pines, 70 miles south of Cuba. During this period he also announced plans for a $20,000,000 shopping center, and leased an ocean-front tract for $2 million, where he said he planned to build a million-dollar hotel. His purchases have averaged $250,000 a day—and he has sold nothing except a tomato farm which was losing money.

What this is all for, few people know. Davis is said to be "interested" in various civic organizations, including hospitals and schools—but whether some foundation will get the fortune remains for the future to reveal. His first wife died in 1908; his second, in 1933. Still a widower, he sees little of his closest relatives, an older brother and a stepdaughter. A faint but enigmatic clue comes from a banker with whom he has been associated: "Mr. Davis has planned everything for the next one hundred years."

Just over five feet tall, white-haired and peppery, Davis at 89 is still a dynamo. Up early every day, he talks business with aides before breakfast, whips into Miami, whirlwinds through business deals at his office, and skips lunch, as he has for years. He spends the afternoon inspecting newly acquired or contemplated enterprises, and often works late at night. He expects the same devotion to work—that is, to making money—on the part of his subordinates. A while ago Mr. Davis spotted an idle workman at one of his projects. "Are you supposed to be working for me?" he asked. "Yes, sir," said the man. "Well, you aren't," snapped Davis. "You aren't sweating!"

Mr. Davis shows few signs of age. His hearing is acute, and he uses eyeglasses only for reading. He walks slowly, but won't accept a helping hand. He dresses nattily, and prefers to wear a vest. He likes to wear his straw hat straight on, with the brim turned up all the way around.

If Davis can be said to have a hobby, it is horticulture. His interest in tropical plant life is intense, and characteristically he has developed this interest in the form of one of the world's largest orchid farms, which he owns. He also seems fond of club life, for he belongs to 27: 7 in Pennsylvania, 12 in New York, 2 in the Bahama Islands and 6 in Miami. Many of these are devoted to sports, in which he has always been interested. He is a founder and former president of the exclusive Porcupine Club of Nassau, and among the ten top millionaires the only active yachtsman.

Davis has several homes, some of which he rarely sees but continues to maintain. He has an apartment at his own Boca Raton Club, and another on Fifth Avenue in New York. He has a fishing camp in the Florida keys, which he rarely visits. He also has a handsome new dwelling on his 30,000 acre property on the island of Eleuthera in the Bahamas. There he has opened up a harbor, built an airstrip, an eighteen-hole golf course and thirty guesthouses. All this, he hopes, will become a tropical paradise retreat for "rich millionaires."

His principal residence, however, is a 50,000-acre estate near Coral Gables, which he has busily torn apart and put together again since he bought it several years ago. The main house is pale pink, Spanish style, with views of soft green lawns and subtropical trees. A deep-water channel has been dredged from Biscayne Bay, a mile away, to a yacht basin near the house. A public road, too close for comfort, has been moved (at Davis' expense) to a quieter distance. An old water tower has been transformed into a miniature campanile—Davis likes to take guests up in the specially installed elevator and show them a view of the Atlantic. Inside the house, the walls are covered with old and with modern paintings. "I don't use an art dealer, just my own bad taste," says Davis. In the kitchen wing lives Trini, a parrot Davis picked up in Trinidad thirty-five years ago. "And he was an old bird then!" he exclaims in admiration.

Davis' official hostess is Evelyn Mitchell, a young Virginian who was his part-time secretary during World War II. Miss Mitchell supervises the staff, plans the menus, sees to the care of Mr. Davis' wardrobe, and handles much of his personal mail. In the early evening, if he is not busy buying a skyscraper or an airline, they sit on the estate's sunlit patio, where Mr. Davis enjoys his favorite dry Martini, smokes a rare cigarette and talks to guests—usually young people, for Davis far prefers their company to that of his contemporaries. ("She was all right," he remarked of a 50-year-old dinner companion, "but rather elderly.")

Sometimes these evenings include a stroll about the estate, with Davis proudly pointing out the rare trees and the long vistas. Christened by a wry sense of humor, the estate is known as "Journey's End." No one ever sees it who is likely to ask Arthur Vining Davis any rude questions about why he keeps on piling up the millions at an age when most men would settle for orchid culture.

A man who has managed to ask a lot of rude questions—and answer some, too—is Henry Ford II, who with his $400 million ranks third in the don't-need-to-ask-how-much-it-costs hierarchy. Since 1945, when he was 27, Ford has guided the destinies of the Ford Motor Company, listening in the early years to a number of blunt questions from old-line executives and union leaders, and answering them apparently to most everyone's satisfaction. The company, which was staggering through evil days when young Ford first took over, is now doing nicely, thank you.

Born in Detroit on September 4, 1917, Ford was the eldest of the four children of Edsel Ford. His grandfather, of course, was old Henry Ford, founder of the business and, in a sense, of the automotive age. From their earliest childhood the new generation of Ford boys was encouraged to play around the assembly plants, to become accustomed to the roar and grind and precision of the industry. Young Ford's first job with the plant, which came after he had decided to quit Yale in 1940, was greasing cars in the driveaway garage at Dearborn. Under the careful supervision of his elders, who had made him a member of the board in 1938, he progressed through other departments, learning the hard way.

In 1941 he joined the United States Naval Reserve, and was commissioned an ensign. Two years later his father died unexpectedly; Ford returned to Detroit to work on war contracts.

Ford became executive vice-president in 1944, but he was far from happy with this high-sounding title or with the company. The old tradition, by which he was still bound, was that the Ford Company never needed to make a profit because Henry Ford and his family, sole owners, were already rich enough. Uninterested by the worry of meeting competition, the company had fallen behind in the automobile scramble. Top executive Harry Bennett was king, and he ran the plant, some considered, on feudal lines. Relations between management and labor were, to put it mildly, not good.

In 1945 grandfather Henry resigned, and at a momentous meeting of the board young Henry the Second was elected in his place. Some say that his mother threatened to put her personal stock on the market—an unthinkable thought—unless her son was made president. Others say that his grandfather's influence and faith were decisive. What is definite is that within minutes of his election Ford fired Harry Bennett.

In common with his fellow millionaires, Ford has the ability to pick good men for the jobs he wants them to do. He brought in Ernest R. Breech, president of Bendix Aviation Corporation, as his over-all trouble shooter; in the next ten years the two men pulled the company out of its hole, eliminated feudalism. When Ford stock first went on the open market in 1956, the move created economic history.

A leading exponent of industrial liberalism and the importance of human relations, Ford has applied his convictions to his own workers; management and labor now sit around the table and come to terms. From 1943 until 1956 he headed the $500 million Ford Foundation created by his father and grandfather in 1936 to help "establish lasting peace throughout the world" and to "eliminate restrictions on freedom of thought, inquiry and expression in the United States." He is now a member of the board of trustees. His personal philanthropies are generous and far-reaching.

In 1940 Ford married Anne McDonnell, of Southampton, New York, turning Roman Catholic to do so. They have two daughters and a son—all of whom are carefully protected, as was Ford when he was a boy, from the danger of kidnapers (when young Ford attended Hotchkiss he had a bodyguard known as a swimming instructor). Ford will not permit, for instance, any photographs taken of his home, a spacious but nonpalatial Georgian brick house comfortably furnished with early American pieces.

Ford is considered to be an amiable person—when he is not opposed. He prefers tweeds, is an expert horseman, plays tennis and golf, enjoys hunting and fishing. He flies his own plane, frequently with his family to Southampton for weekends.

Most days he rises around 6 A.M. and drives to the factory in a new car, one day off the assembly line. Having tested it, going and coming, he returns it and picks up another new one for the evening drive home. Ford seldom goes to night clubs, but entertains frequently at home. He is a moderate social drinker, and a rare to hardly-ever smoker. He golfs in the 90's, and sometimes takes his wife skiing. He insists firmly that he understands nothing about machinery. Nevertheless, he seems to be doing all right.

And so is Howard Hughes, who weighs in with Joseph N. Pew, Jr., at $350 million. Over the years, more words have probably been written about this gaunt meteor than about all the other men put together. For all the others have a flair for life, but in Hughes the flair approaches genius.

He has always been much more than just rich. He is a man who took over his father's tool plant when he was 20, and turned it into a multimillion-dollar business. He is the man

Nowadays... it's COLOR that counts

When great grandmother could sit on her long glossy tresses, people were impressed. And hair styles to show it off were fussy as a wedding cake. Today, women are far too busy to fool with elaborate hair styles or hours of grooming. They've learned that real beauty lies in a casual hair-do enhanced with sparkling natural-looking color.

That's why more and more women turn to Noreen Color Hair Rinses. They do so much for hair with so little time and effort. Among Noreen's 14 glamorous shades there are several that will beautify the basic color of your hair.

A blonde using Noreen can be many blondes; silvery, golden or strawberry, as she wishes. A brunette can shift from blue-black to warm brown. A brownette finds in Noreen gold lights, brown shadows or a coppery glow. Faded, streaked or gray hairs are blended-in and toned. ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

You've probably noticed . . . when you're under emotional pressure, your perspiration glands suddenly get more active. That's when deodorants which depend on stopping perspiration let you down, and odor often starts.

New Mum® Cream works a completely different way. It is the only leading deodorant that works entirely by stopping odor. Mum keeps on working actively to stop odor 24 hours a day—no matter how active your perspiration glands are.

No wonder Mum is so dependable. Isn't that what you want?

More people depend on MUM than on any other deodorant . . . it works when others fail who made Hell's Angels, and discovered Jean Harlow. He is the man who broke the land, transcontinental and round-the-world speed records in planes he designed, built and flew himself. He is a man who never remarried after an early divorce, and who has spent his playboy hours escorting girls like Billie Dove, Katharine Hepburn, Lana Turner, Mitzi Gaynor, Ava Gardner and Ginger Rogers. People say he is a man who knows how to break up a romance without breaking up a friendship. And he is the man who, while making The Outlaw, designed the cantilever brassière which started Jane Russell on the road to fame.

Howard Hughes' father was a Missouri lawyer who started out for the far West early in the century, and found himself permanently delayed in Texas. Attempting to drill for oil, he was balked by the problem of getting through rock—so he invented a rock drill, and founded the Hughes Tool Company to manufacture it. In his childhood young Howard, who had been born on December 24, 1905, was allowed to play around the tool yards. By the age of three a talent for mechanical invention was unmistakable; a few years later his father equipped a complete workshop for the boy. In his early teens he built himself a radio, with odds and ends of electrical equipment lying around the shop. At 15 he began taking flying lessons, with his father's money and reluctant blessings.

For schooling, he attended the Fessenden School, near Boston; the Thacher School in Ojai, California; and Rice Institute, in Houston. He was a freshman at the California Institute of Technology, Pasadena, California, when his father died. He was only 18, but a year or so later he took over complete control of the $500,000 company and put it on the road to its present million-dollar-profits success.

By 1926, the business safely in the capable hands of his managers and the money pouring in, Hughes went to Hollywood to satisfy his ambition to make movies. His first successful one was Hell's Angels, with Jean Harlow, which cost $4 million to make and brought in a profit of $3 million. Hughes did a great deal of the writing and directing himself, as he did on his following pictures, Scarface and The Front Page. A few years later he produced The Outlaw, and fought it through the censors.

But movies weren't enough to absorb the energies of this thin and driving young man. After a session of copiloting with American Airlines, deciding what he thought was wrong with commercial planes, he set up a workshop in a Los Angeles hangar, and started designing planes. The flights resulting from this experimentation made him famous, and fame reached its climax in 1938 when he broke the current record by flying around the world in three days and nineteen hours.

While Hughes is no longer a record-breaking aviator, he still retains his interest in flying. He helped design and launch the Constellation, he owns the majority of the stock of Trans World Airlines, and he flies his own private planes. He also spends time on the affairs of the Hughes Tool Company, on the brewery he decided to establish in one of the company's unused buildings (which is now one of the largest breweries in the West) and until recently the RKO motion-picture studios, which he picked up one casual morning in Hollywood for $8,825,690.

These days Hughes lives most of the time in Las Vegas, Nevada, where he leads a strange and outwardly lonely life. He works until he is tired, he sleeps until he is rested—sometimes at his house, sometimes in hotel rooms. He eats when he feels like it, usually steak, green salad with Roquefort dressing. He carries most of his business in his head, and does business by telephone, often calling associates in the middle of the night. "I don't know whether Howard is a genius or crazy," says one of them. "Maybe he's a little of both. I know I sometimes feel like blowing my top when I hear the phone ring at four A.M. But then he's always so polite and apologetic for waking me up, I forget about it."

People of "importance" find it hard to get near Hughes. Sometimes he disappears, even from his associates, for days at a time. But when he is in Las Vegas he wanders into and out of the night spots at all hours, often lingering to talk with bellboys or bartenders. He seldom drinks or gambles. "Howard likes Las Vegas because he is nocturnal in his habits and Las Vegas never sleeps," says a friend. "He likes to be able to find a restaurant open in case he wants a sandwich."

Hughes' wife, the beautiful Ella Rice, whom he married when he was 19, divorced him a few years later, mostly for inattention. Since then he has had many romances, but none of them serious enough to lead to marriage. As for the women involved, they are said to fall in love not with his fortune or his fame but actually with Hughes himself.

In many ways, Hughes seems frugal. He spends almost nothing on clothes, for his favorite dress is shirt, slacks and tennis shoes. Sometimes he makes night-club managers add up the check again in his presence, asking why they charged so much for some particular item. He has no known church affiliation, and his only recorded recent philanthropies have been the Howard Hughes Medical Institute and the Howard Hughes Medical Research Scholarships and Fellowships, both of California. The standard directory, American Foundations and Their Fields, states that it was unable to obtain any information on these organizations for the 1955 edition. Howard Hughes may be the most publicized millionaire, but it is clear that not everything about him is known, nor will it ever be.

At the opposite end of the publicity spectrum is Joseph Newton Pew, Jr., contender for the $350 million third place. In Mr. Pew's Philadelphian (that is, non-Texan) environs, money is not impressive. Family is. So is the Republican Party. So is the Presbyterian Church. Publicity is definitely not desirable, and over the years the Pew family has managed to avoid it with dignified agility. Even the Pew Memorial Foundation, organized in Philadelphia by the family in 1948 "exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, literary or educational purposes," and reporting assets of over $100 million, is virtually unknown, even in Philadelphia.

Joseph Pew was born in Pittsburgh on November 12, 1886, son of the founder of the Sun Oil Company. He attended Haverford School, Haverford, Pennsylvania, and was graduated from Cornell in 1908. He joined Sun Oil the same year, first working in the purchasing department and then, at his father's suggestion, laying pipe in the oil field and performing other oily but instructive tasks for five years. After that he rose, to become chairman in 1947. He is also chairman of the board of the associated Sun Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company, of which his older brother, John Howard Pew, is a director.

Aside from oil, Mr. Pew's primary passion for many years has been the Republican Party—particularly the party in Pennsylvania. However, his political power resulting from his generosity has somewhat waned in recent years, due to Democratic gains at the Pennsylvania polls. Other philanthropies include the Pew Foundation, the Presbyterian Church and a Philadelphia hospital.

Mr. Pew lives in Ardmore, on Philadelphia's socially correct Main Line. His large and handsome house is of red brick, and the garden is a show place. In the spring a beautiful rock garden is its main feature. The house, comfortable but not conspicuous, is furnished with eighteenth-century Philadelphia antiques. In addition, there is a country estate not many miles away, with a spacious stone house, some riding horses and a herd of beef cattle. Something of a sportsman, in his youth Pew was a squash and tennis player. He is also an ardent salmon fisherman.

Six feet tall, with bushy eyebrows and a shrewd, long upper lip, Mr. Pew is said to have "a quick humorless smile." He lives a quiet and decorous life with his wife, whom he married in 1916, participating only mildly in the social affairs of the Main Line. Their three daughters and their son, all married, live nearby.

As different from Mr. Pew as a rumba from a minuet, Clint W. Murchison breezes in next with his $300 million. Mr. Murchison likes loud neckties, hearty companions, and the eep pleasure which comes from owning half a undred big companies. He owns gas lines and il wells, taxi, bus and steamship companies, a ring of motels, a chain of grocery stores, anks and insurance companies, a fishing-ackle factory, a New York book-publishing ouse, and part of the New York Central ailway. He owns a chain of radio and tele-ision stations and a chain of drugstores. He is art owner of three large cattle ranches. He is, aturally, a Texan.

Murchison's father was the bank president n Athens, Texas, where young Clint was born n 1895. His father taught him the mysteries of nance early, and brought him into the bank s a teller after the boy had been expelled from rinity University for shooting craps and re-using to sign a pledge that he would shoot no nore. By this time, however, young Murchi-on had learned all about trading from his riend Richardson, four years his senior. After short and boring stint, e quit the bank and tarted out on his own, rst in trading, then ith Richardson in oil.

By the time he was 32 e could, and did, sell ut his interests for $5 nillion, and retire. But e soon discovered that unting and fishing as full-time occupation eft much to be desired: rincipally the fun of naking more money. oon he was back in fi-ancial circulation, con-entrating at first on atural gas, but even-ually proliferating into is present state of mul-iple ownership. He lets ood managers run his ompanies, and spends is own abundant ener-ies on what is some-imes called "wheeling and dealing."

"Murchison is the kind of man," says Richardson, laughing, 'who tells you, 'Here, hold this horse while I go and catch another one.' First thing you know, you got your hands full of Murchison horses." One Murchison horse, for a while, was Senator Joseph McCarthy, a good friend.

Murchison's first wife died while his two sons were young, and the busy tycoon brought them up himself. The two boys, recently graduated from Yale and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, are now associated with their father in business.

With his pretty second wife, Virginia, Murchison lives in a twenty-room mansion near Dallas. He likes to give big parties, to see his guests take off their coats, roll up their sleeves and have a good time. A focus of most parties is a large bar, with walls covered with tarpon scales. He keeps a private plane for business trips, and also to whisk him to Richardson's island in the Gulf of Mexico, or his own huge ranch and shooting preserve in the mountains of Mexico. The Murchisons once entertained the Duke and Duchess of Windsor at the ranch, and the visit apparently left no permanent scars on either side.

A man's-type man, Murchison says the favorite of his several homes is the one which has eight beds in one room, "so a group of us boys can talk oil all night." Wherever he is, though, his servants know when he's home by his undeviating shout of arrival: "Start the juleps rolling!"

Like Clint Murchison's father, Paul Mellon's father was also a banker—but rather richer. Andrew Mellon's banking, steel, aluminum and oil fortune could never be estimated, but it was thought to be over a billion; when he became President Hoover's Secretary of the Treasury he resigned from the boards of fifty-one corporations. His son Paul comes along in the $250 million class, and with only a few banking and philanthropic-fund associations to his Who's Who name.

Young Paul, who was born in 1907, grew up in a large, gloomy Pittsburgh mansion, surrounded by servants, guards and underlings; he was a little frightened of his awesome father, and spoke later of his father's "ice-water smile." His parents were divorced when he was a child, and his mother returned to her native Ireland, where the boy spent several months with her every year. With this background, it is perhaps not surprising that Paul Mellon resembles the description of his father: "The shiest of all American men of wealth." Little or nothing is printed about his personal life.

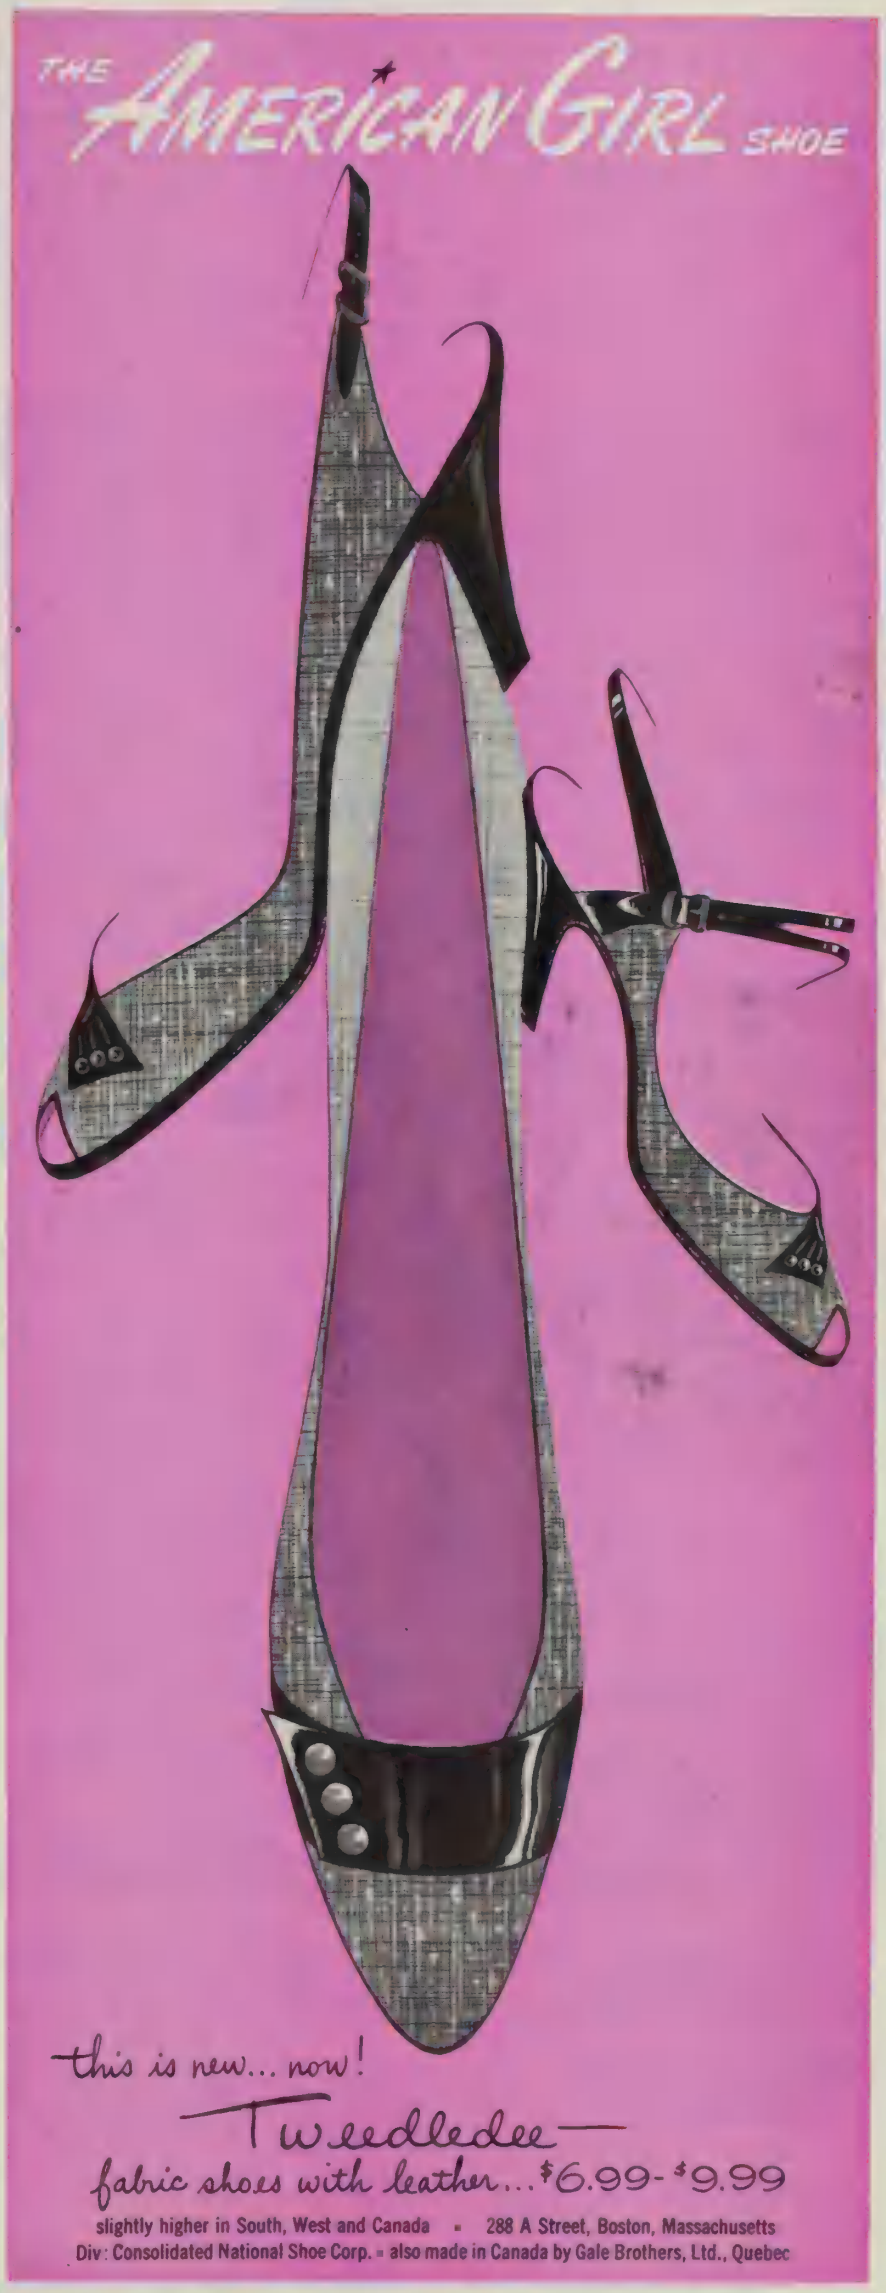
Young Paul attended Choate and Yale, to both of which alma maters he has since contributed generously. At Yale he wrote poetry, edited the literary magazine, and said he wanted to be a publisher. But after graduation he went into the banking business; in 1931 he began learning it in the Mellon National Bank of Pittsburgh, under the direct supervision of his father. Except for a four-year spell with the Army (in which he enlisted in 1941 as a private) and the OSS overseas, he has been continuously associated with his father's industrial and financial enterprises.

But there is much more to Paul Mellon than banking. Described as a scholar and philosopher by his friends, he shows his true interests in the organizations to which he has chosen to give both time and money. He created and finances the Bollingen Foundation, which helps scholars and gives an annual and coveted prize to poets. He created the Old Dominion Foundation, which is interested in the humanities, higher education, mental health and the conservation of natural resources. He is director of the Fund for the Advancement of Education (created by the Ford Foundation) and a trustee of Washington's great National Gallery of Art, which his father gave to the nation. In 1939 young Mellon actively directed interior construction of the gallery.

Mellon's many philanthropies are quiet, effective and clearly motivated by sincere personal interest in human welfare.

"I believe that it is essential that private citizens rather than the Government support our colleges," he once said in a speech. "It's much healthier to have our colleges supported directly by the people."

Mellon's first wife, whom he married in 1935 and who bore him a boy and a girl, died in 1946. Two years later he married his present wife, Rachel. Their home is a spacious stone house with white pillars on an estate in Virginia. There, for many years, Mellon has operated the famous Rokeby Stables, which has produced many winning race horses. Something of a fisherman, for a long time he had an estate in Florida, which he sold in 1950. Mellon, unlike some of the other millionaires, is a man of many facets.



So is August A. Busch, the St. Louis brewer who, of all the millionaires, seems to many to get the most fun from his money. In his case it amounts to $250 million, and never has a fortune been more zestfully enjoyed—except

GRANDMOTHER

By HELEN MITCHEL

With thread and needle she outlined a bear,
A romping dog, a kitten and a duck
On bibs her three grandchildren were to wear
When eating at her table. She would tuck
The white cloth under famished mouths, and I,
A youthful mother, had no knowledge of
The tender memories they must untie,
Nor had I lived enough to fathom love.

But now her gentle hands are lost to view
Among the shadows, lessening like a dream.
I have the bibs . . . they're all worn out but two,
And even they are frayed along the seam.
Sit still, my precious grandson, while I pin
This romping dog beneath your baby chin.

perhaps by his grandfather Adolphus, who came from Bavaria 100 years ago and turned a little brewery into a giant.

At 58, Busch is a joyful leader in the vitality sweepstakes. He sings German folk songs until midnight, and gallops at dawn in pink coat and bowler hat over the Missouri fields on one of his hunters. He drives a dashing sleigh over the snows in winter, and is a sharp-eyed man with a shotgun when the geese and ducks are flying over. He lives in princely splendor with his family in a great French Renaissance château a few miles south of St. Louis, where he has been known to entertain on one occasion 11,000 beer wholesalers, retailers and saloonkeepers. Usually, however, he entertains his family—a large, cohesive and sociable clan. Believing, as he once said, that only sports involving wild animals, dogs, guns and horses were worthy of a man's attention, Busch startled the sports world in 1953 when he bought the St. Louis Cardinals, a baseball team. Today he loves to put on the Cardinal uniform and toss the ball around with the boys.

August Busch is the fourth member of his family to head the Anheuser-Busch Brewery. His father and grandfather were already immensely wealthy when he was born in St. Louis on March 28, 1899, and the boy was raised in a tradition of luxury and German joviality. There was a zoo on the Grant's Farm estate (where Mr. Busch still lives) and every summer the two elephants and the Shetland ponies were moved with the family to the summer home in Cooperstown, New York. Early in life the boy was taught to ride: first Sicilian donkeys, then Shetland ponies, then hunters and jumpers.

Schooling was casual, and after a short stay at Smith Academy, a private school in St. Louis, he left the academic life forever. "Without doubt," he says now, "I was the world's lousiest student. I never graduated from anything."

But young Busch entered the family business in 1924, learned the hard way while the company made soft drinks and yeast during prohibition, and took over with a capable hand following the death of his father, and later of his older brother. Today he is president of the company, which he largely owns with his family.

Generally considered hot-tempered but fair, Busch often bellows at his family or at members of his board, "Let me finish! Then you can blow your top!"

His voice is said to resemble that of a hoarse lion. The effect, however, is particularly good on Ach du Lieber Augustin or Ist Das Nicht Ein Schnitzelbank?

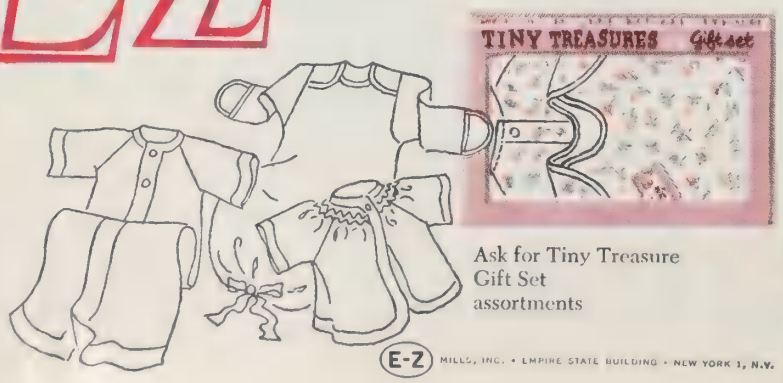
Busch's first wife died in 1933; his second marriage ended in divorce and a one-million-dollar property settlement. His third wife, Gertrude, the daughter of a Swiss restaurant proprietor, is tall and beautiful. She shares her husband's enthusiasm for chasing foxes and, like him, is an excellent shot. In the family tradition, she loves wild animals (there are herds of deer and a zoo on the estate) and sometimes adopts and raises motherless fawns. She also loves to travel about the country with her husband, who first used a private bus fitted out like a land yacht, then a private plane, and who now owns and uses the most luxurious private railroad car on the tracks. An eighty-six-foot home-away-from-home, it is equipped with a sitting room, four conference rooms, kitchen, bar, baths, accommodations for eleven people, and a generous supply of beer. To visitors, the car gives a dazzling impression of stainless steel and glass. The décor is "advanced modern."

Since his last marriage, some say Mr. Busch no longer shouts and hollers in the old free style. Mrs. Busch, say his friends, has gentled him to the point where his supply of energy is now only tremendous.

Possessing another kind of energy, quiet John D. Rockefeller III uses most of it to give money away in useful ways. Between 1900 and 1953 the Rockefeller family gave away one billion dollars of its oil-founded wealth. The five Rockefeller brothers, John, Nelson, Laurance, Winthrop and David, are continuing the tradition. Most of them probably possess wealth close to that of their elder brother, but his is thought to be slightly larger because of his position in the family and also because of careful investment of what was a slightly bigger sum to begin with. Their father has for years been distributing his money among his sons.

"John and his four brothers feel," the New York Times quotes a friend as saying, "that their wealth is not a God-given right. It's an accident to them that they have this wealth. Therefore they have a powerful sense of responsibility to see that the means that are theirs are used not just for personal ends, but for social ends.

"And as they've gone along, they've also felt that whatever job they've done has had to be justified on its own merits, that they didn't buy their way into anything. They've had to work at it."



John, with his $250 million, his disinterest in business, his position as eldest brother and his inborn sense of dedication, has probably worked hardest. Since his graduation from Princeton in 1929 (encouraged at first by his father, but later under his own steam) he has taken an active and direct interest in the work of the many Rockefeller foundations and other organizations which he heads.

The gentlest and most withdrawn of the brothers, Rockefeller is known for his quiet tact, for his determination to study all the facts at first hand before making a decision. Not many years ago he made a grueling trip through the jungles of Africa, trying to find out for himself where his money might do the most good. So modest was his rumpled appearance, so unheralded his arrival that many officials refused to believe that he really was John D. Rockefeller III.

Recent interests, branching out from those of his family, include the world's pressing population problem, and the Far East—Japan in particular. He now travels frequently to Japan, and likes nothing better than sitting around in fishing or farming villages, talking to fishermen or peasants. He also is fond of talk sessions with student groups, even in India where students are famously critical of American capitalism.

By report, he enjoys his new presidency of the projected Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts in New York City—the first time any member of his family has been associated with this branch of the arts.

"I never had any great knowledge or particular ability in the arts," he says. "But my wife majored in music in college and had a broader experience in the arts than I. And we have given our four children the same exposure, and it has been a really significant factor in their development. They get great pleasure from concerts, from good records and from their own playing."

Raised in a frugal tradition by his parents, Rockefeller at 51 now lives not frugally but quietly. He and his tall, willowy and charming wife, the former Blanchette Hooker, do little entertaining and usually go to bed fairly early. Rockefeller has been known to shudder visibly at the suggestion that a short night-club stop might be made on the way home from the theater. He almost never drinks, although he might sip at a sherry on festival days. Unless he is staying at the family estate in the country, he rises early in his duplex apartment overlooking New York's East River, and walks across town to his skyscraper office. All day, then, he is deep in plans for wiping out malaria, balancing man and nature in Japan, or building comfortable dressing rooms for New York's actors.

"He has a beautiful soul," commented a Japanese, smiling at the phrase, but sure of his judgment.

Though Rockefeller seems devoted almost entirely to the sweet uses of prosperity, Robert Winship Woodruff, our last millionaire (with $200 million), seems a fine example of the well-rounded life. For many years Woodruff has managed to balance sports, business and philanthropy in his life. He is almost unknown out of his native South—yet he is Coca-Cola, he golfs with President Eisenhower, and the research station he established has virtually wiped out malaria in Georgia.

Woodruff's father had the foresight to buy the Coca-Cola Company in 1919 from another visionary who had bought it from the inventor for $1750. The elder Woodruff paid $25 million, and it is now worth many times that amount.

Young Robert, who was born in Columbus, Georgia, in 1889, trudged through military academy and a few semesters of Emory University in Georgia and then left to work on his own. In 1923 he permitted his father to bring him into the business as president—and he has been a power in the industry ever since.

Like Henry Ford, Woodruff recognized that a business is happy if the workers, the retailers and everyone concerned are also happy. Coca-Cola is very happy indeed, particularly since it has become a world-wide beverage.

In 1955 Woodruff retired, but his life is far from idle. He loves to entertain, and his plantation in South Georgia with its gracious, Southern-style house is famous for its hospitality. He is a strenuous host, however, smoking numerous strong cigars, drinking (Coca-Cola, no doubt) and playing poker until midnight and expecting his guests (male variety) to do likewise. At dawn the guests are roused to go hunting, and protests have no effect. President Eisenhower is said to be the only guest who ever rose earlier than Woodruff, somewhat to Woodruff's reported dismay.

Woodruff has had the same butler for thirty-five years, the same cook for thirty years. And he has also been fortunate with the women in his life. Of his mother, a servant said when she died, "Miss Emily was the sort of person who could go to heaven without changing her clothes." He has had the same tiny, devoted and lively wife for forty-four years—a constant companion on Woodruff's many travels, often quietly in the background, but usually right there. "Miss Nell's" influence is particularly felt on the plantation, where she has encouraged the Negro laborers to sing the old spirituals, and has in effect organized a choir. Listening to their songs in the evenings is a favorite pastime.

Woodruff is said by his friends to be a combination of his shrewd businessman father and his warm, generous and gentle mother. It is her influence, perhaps, which makes his philanthropies many, and as private as he can keep them.

"A religious man" in the eyes of his friends, he has contributed heavily to the Presbyterian Church, and has helped his Negro friends with their churches and boys' clubs. He has given sizable grants to Emory University to help fight cancer, malaria and venereal diseases. Close friends notice that until he has diverted some of his profits to useful human service he seems uncomfortable.

Apparently extroverted, Woodruff has restless and moody spells, when he recalls his favorite saying: "The future belongs to the discontented." Often he broods. But this, it seems, is an occupational disease suffered by all conscientious millionaires. END

There's more Fun than Money in Teaching

All five Dennerleins go to school in Long Beach, California—two work, three study. Rosellen and Gerald pool pay checks for family expenses.

LONG BEACH, CALIFORNIA

TO THE EDITORS OF THE JOURNAL: Say! How about the plight of the not-so-young mothers? What about us who had our several babies during the years 1935–45—before television, sans baby sitters? I'll tell you where a lot of us are now: working outside the home trying to boost the family income to meet added financial demands—the expenses of orthodontia, glasses, illnesses, music lessons and higher education.

Our girls are 19, 15 and 12, attending college, high school and junior high. To top it off, my husband is a high-school teacher, and I work as a secretary (Civil Service) in an elementary school. Boy! Are we education-minded! We manage to scrape through the school year (narrowly) financially, so that the two summer months can be spent pursuing our special interests—and we swim and swim and swim. But this is a year-round vacationers' paradise—Long Beach, California, 40 miles below Los Angeles. Best of all is our little peninsula. Can you imagine living three houses from a lovely bay and one very short block from a beautiful ocean beach?

We live in a little six-room Spanish stucco house which badly needs fixing, furnishing and paying for. (How do we spend the money we earn? If I just write necessities, you have it in a nutshell.) I'm afraid we'll never have a fancy family room or a dreamy kitchen, but the place will always be running over with people, swim suits, driftwood and sand, sand, sand.

Sincerely, ROSELLEN DENNERLEIN

From the sun deck over the garage, you see white sails glinting in the bay, and houses in sugar-candy colors, piled as close as bonbons, on the little peninsula stretching below Long Beach. To match the view, there's thirty-nine-year-old Rosellen Dennerlein, with a golden tan, tawny hair and eyes the color of sky-blue water. In a brilliant tangerine sailcloth dress, she might pose for "Relax in sunny California—while working 75 hours a week."

Forty of the hours are spent on a job that earns $3300 a year. On the side, she washes, irons, cleans, sews for herself and three daughters, and keeps up with a nonstop husband. "He believes in do-it-yourself-with-the-whole-family-helping."

Two-hundred-and-ninety-pound Gerald Dennerlein has a genial, boyish face, topping a massive six-foot-one body, and it wears an incongruously worried look—like a baby who has swallowed a penny—when he talks about money. "It's always been the toughest problem in our married life. There hasn't been a single day when I didn't worry about it."

His wife said, "Well, of course it's a problem, but I think the way people get along is a lot more important. The toughest problem I ever had was to make a working combination of our marriage, and not be dominated. The first few years Gerry wanted to make all the decisions, but I felt I was grown up enough to make some mature decisions on my own. I wanted us to be able to discuss things right out in the open frankly, and both have a say."

"Well, that's how we operate now," her husband said, with as much satisfaction as if he had invented the CONTINUED ON PAGE 183

Meals are hearty at all hours. Food bills run $250 a month. But it was "the extras"—and higher education—that persuaded Rosellen to take 8:00 A.M. to 4:30 P.M. job.

"We worked out the plan six years ago..." says Gerald Small tile-roofed house is a step from bay, has 1180 square feet of living space on 30' x 80' lot. "We can only move up. But one sniff of this sea air . . . it's heaven," family decided in 1950.

By 4:45 there's still time for a swim, driftwood hunting, a picnic on beach. Kathy, 12, misses her mother most during day, tags after her in free hours.

"How do we spend the money? Necessities... in a nutshell"

It was a plan that sent his wife to a job and brought them to Long Beach. Up to then, the Dennerleins had lived in seven different communities in California, wherever Gerry's work took them. "And in some pretty awful rented places, because of the housing shortage. But this was the place we dreamed of. Both of us had been coming down from Los Angeles to the beach here since we were kids. One sniff of this sea air"—she inhaled blissfully—"some people think it smells fishy, but to us it's heaven."

In the fall of 1950, the "working combination" got within more than sniffing distance of their heaven. Gerry began teaching at Polytechnic High School of the Long Beach Unified School District, and his current salary, after deductions, is $529.73 a month. Rosellen worked first in Payroll Accounting at the Board of Education, then after taking Civil Service exams, as secretary-clerk to the principal of the Fremont Elementary School. During an 8-A.M.-to-4:30 day, her duties hurtle the gamut from bookkeeping to wiping the bloody nose of a five-year-old battler. "The nurse is there only three half days a week, and I'm the first-aid station the rest of the time." Her take-home pay, $248.62 (covering ten months, like Gerry's), helped buy their house, "the nicest present we ever gave each other, and a fabulous buy at $11,000. The down payment—$2000—scraped our savings right to the bottom." Carrying charges are $100 a month. "And we still don't have any savings, because it's all gone into the house."

Of the $3000 they've spent on remodeling, the Gerry-built sun deck cost $500, and is worth every penny and blister. The walls are sea-green plastic glass, mellowed brick and redwood, with ice plants cascading down. Sprawl-out redwood chairs flaunt bright terry-cloth covers. There's a trestle table with benches near the charcoal grill, and a charming driftwood piece like an abstract sculpture, christened Venus Dennerlein. "Gerry even scraped every brick himself, after he bought a load of old ones." She went on in a pleased tone, "I doubt if many men would do as much around the house. Since I've been working he does most of the cook——"

At this point, her husband let out a bellow of anguish. "My soup! I forgot my soup!" He dashed to the two-burner gas plate in the corner opposite the grill, tasted the contents of a vast iron pot, and said raptly, "Out of this world. I put in nine kinds of vegetables."

"He even does all the marketing," his wife said, beaming, "because he gets out of school at three-thirty. Of course sometimes he overbuys, because of his appetite. Our food runs about $250 a month—more than a third of our budget. And we have a terrible time making Gerry diet. He's lost 20 pounds lately, from 310, but he ought to get down to 250. That was his weight when he played football. His friends look at him now and say, 'Hold that line!' And the girls' latest nickname for him is Large Economy Size."

Her husband hurriedly dropped the ladle back into the pot. "You can imagine what my life is like, living with four women," he said piteously.

His wife burst out laughing. "Do you know what his worst fault is? We have to bawl him out because he won't do anything by himself. Even when he goes for his daily swim or takes his after-dinner walk on the beach, he always wants at least one of us along."

"Well, I like their company."

"Now it's your turn to tell my worst fault," his wife said generously.

He tugged at his thick brown hair, thinking. "Well, she's an awfully hard worker."

Snacks and dinner often run together. Gerry frequently cooks on charcoal grill or makes specialties like Dutch spareribs. Nights are usually spent at home. The 3 girls may go out to movies; their parents go "four or five times a year, no more." Favored pursuits are TV, books, P.T.A. work—"if chores are done—that's our rule."

Evenings, after job, Rosellen gets to home sewing. She makes girls' clothes, her own, Gerry's sports shirts. "but we practically live in beach clothes all year." Wardrobe problem: blending clothes and sun tans. Carol (in green) has delicate skin, light hair, tans slightly. Darlene (in blue) needs clothes that cover "year-round bathing-suit-strap marks." Kathy, still undating, "isn't fussy yet."

"When the girls are through school," Dennerleins agree, "we'll take time out to travel—and rest!" Current trips are camp-outs, trips to national parks, drives to nearby desert.

In 21st year of marriage, Dennerleins see clear sailing ahead

"That's a fault!" Rosellen exclaimed.

He grinned. "I'm just starting out cautiously." Then his face sobered. "Besides, it's only fair to mention that first. She's worked with me all the way through. And since I've been doing research on my doctorate dissertation, I'll bet she's typed enough for me to fill a garage."

His wife, who had been typing all Sunday morning till the visitor's arrival, said with a kind of fond exasperation, "But he wants things to go at too rapid a pace. Our problem is to keep the lid on him. The rest of us like to proceed in a more leisurely way."

Her "leisurely way" starts at 6:10 A.M., and ends with ironing and sewing at night. "The girls and I draw straws every Saturday to see who cleans which rooms. Then we do the washing, but the ironing hangs over to haunt me. I often drag the board in where I can watch TV with Gerry in the evenings, to take the curse off ironing."

Sewing rates no curses. "Last night I counted up, just for fun, how many things in our closets and drawers I had made myself. They came to seventy-two, not counting anything in the wash." This includes everything from her husband's sports shirts to a floating green-mist evening dress spattered with rhinestones which fifteen-year-old Carol wore to a recent girls'-club dance of Job's Daughters. From one of the three small bedrooms, Rosellen brought out a pile of brilliant fabrics bought at sales and cached away, which she displayed as lovingly as jewels. Rather regretfully, she said, "But we have to buy an occasional coat or suit now, because since I've been working I just don't have time to tailor." In a happier tone, she continued, "But of course we practically live in beach clothes at home, most of the year round."

"Let's go join the girls on the beach," Gerry suggested hopefully.

The Dennerleins look at you in astonishment, and even pity, when they learn that having left New York on a cold fall day, you somehow neglected to bring a bathing suit. Soon you find yourself in hospitably loaned raiment, lolling on the white sands a minute's walk from the house, watching Rosellen and twelve-year-old Kathy ride the waves on an impromptu raft—the rubber mattress from a sleeping bag used on camping-out trips. Gerry, between dips, comes to join you in admiring his older daughters' expert aquatics. "They're a darn sight better swimmers than I am. Been bringing them to the beach ever since they could walk." His wife, in a bright wool swim suit that showed off her attractive 135-pound figure, sat down to dry her short hair. She said, "The only time the girls balk at coming down here is when Gerry wants them to help him lug twenty-foot boards home for firewood. They think it's undignified."

Like their father, both older girls tower over Rosellen. Nineteen-year-old Darlene is two inches under six feet, with clear olive skin, an extremely pretty face, and Gerry's big-boned tendency to overweight; she weighs well over 170 pounds. She's now a sophomore at Long Beach State College. "Tuition's only $29.50 a semester. That's one of the many reasons we wanted to live here. All three girls can have a good education, and otherwise we just couldn't swing it."

Darlene and Carol earned $75 apiece last summer, baby-sitting, and they use this for club dues, a once-a-week movie, and so on. Each of them now has a joint checking account with a parent, to learn the mysteries of finance. The family budget pays for college textbooks, bought mostly secondhand and sold at the end of the year. Rosellen talked with quiet pride of Darlene's school record: B average, member of the Intervarsity Club, the Association of Women Students, and Westminster, a CONTINUED ON PAGE 186

Why do you suppose the manufacturer put a box of Tide in your new automatic?

"I recommend Tide for every automatic," says John E. Ryan of Hempstead, Long Island, N.Y. "Folks ask so many questions about what's best for their machines! And I've discovered that to start people off with Tide gives them the kind of clean washes that makes them bless the day they bought their automatic."

...so your automatic will give you the cleanest clothes possible!

"Next to us... Mommy likes Tide-clean clothes."
Maybe you've thought there isn't much difference in the matter of cleanness. Oh, but there is! You'll discover that as soon as you take your first fluffy, sweet-smelling Tide wash from the dryer or line. You know, Tide brought you the greatest cleaning power the washday world had ever known, and that cleaning power has never been surpassed. No washday product made, nothing can beat Tide for getting clothes clean. Next washday, hang out a Tide-clean wash!

Presbyterian group. "And when she was in Wilson High, she was one of twenty out of a class of eight hundred who won a jeweled W for best all-round student."

Later, back at the house, Darlene mentioned that occasion as "one of the few times when I felt the disadvantage of having mother working. I'd won something I was sort of proud of, and a lot of parents came for the presentation. I guess I felt a little wistful mother couldn't be there." She added quickly, "Mother's still good about discussing lessons and school things with us, but of course we aren't as apt to bother her when we know she's so busy."

Rosellen said, "The minute I get home, I'm dying to hear what's happened to them all day, but Gerry has a rule, 'No shoptalk at dinner,' so the girls and I get together beforehand and get caught up on news. Gerry's students think he's a big good-natured guy without a nerve in his body. And he's wonderful with them. They'd do anything for him. But he uses up all his enthusiasm and patience with them, and by the end of a day he's had it. He can't stand any more school talk."

Carol, a statuesquely good-looking 5′ 8″ blonde, gave her father an impish glance. "At least we wait till he brings up the subject himself, and then everybody talks school."

Gerry laughed rather sheepishly.

"We ride him a lot, but we pet him, too," Rosellen said.

"He rides us, too," Carol pointed out. "He calls us My Boys. And he nicknamed me Flamingo because I'm long and skinny-legged." Any flamingo lucky enough to have Carol's legs would be in instant demand as a model. She's a junior in Wilson High, and like Darlene plans to be a teacher. A course she especially enjoys is art; one of her attractive pastels, a still life, hangs above the upright piano in the white-walled living room, and she's recently done an amusing wire sculpture of Elvis Presley.

Watching her quick, wide smile, you remember Rosellen saying, "When I started to work, Carol had to have braces, and then Kathy, so that was twenty-five dollars a month for orthodontia."

Kathy is still wearing braces, which she refers to cheerfully as ironwork. She has hazel eyes (the only non-blue-eyed member of the family), a small, piquant face, and a friendliness that pops out as sunnily as her freckles. Although Rosellen had mentioned that her two older daughters sometimes feel Gerry favors Kathy as a companion, you notice that both Darlene and Carol speak up quickly when their father teases Kathy about her left-handedness, and get him to stop. And it's with warm affection that they tell you, "We may complain sometimes about having to house-clean all day Saturday, but if any of us had to make a real adjustment when mother started working, it was Kathy."

Kathy seems to be taking any problems of adjustment in her beautifully balanced stride. "They claim I talk in my sleep and scream out." She shrugged and grinned. "If they had it on tape, I might believe them." Kathy is in eighth grade, and brings home straight A's and a host of young admirers. She is also athletic representative of her home room, and acted out with great vividness a crisis in a recent volleyball game. Her stick-at-itiveness is rather awesome: when a small neighbor caught a fish, Kathy decided she too would catch a fish. She stayed on the beach in a broiling sun for 6½ hours (her worried father took her lunch down) and returned with a large corbina and an even larger sunburn.

When she appears in a fresh play suit, she forestalls a visitor's foolish questions by saying gaily, "No, this is one my mother did not make."

This reminds you to ask why clothing, on the itemized budget, comes to $50 a month, in spite of all the saving in sewing. "Oh, that covers all our Christmas and birthday presents, too," Rosellen explained. "I just lump them together."

"You should hear four women hinting at me ahead about birthdays," Gerry said.

A chorus of feminine voices chanted, "He never remembers dates. The only thing he can't forget is Christmas."

"Well, I don't like picking out presents just because I'm supposed to," their father said. "Maybe that's bad of me, but I can't help it."

Again the female chorus rose, this time to cite unscheduled presents he'd brought them recently, including a small carpet sweeper for his wife—"I'd been longing for one"—and a double study lamp for Carol and Kathy's bedroom.

"So how could we get mad at him for forgetting sometimes?" Rosellen asked simply. "And whenever we have an anniversary coming up, I get two tickets for the Community Playhouse or something, and then I say, 'Gerry, we're going to do such-and-so to celebrate.' Then he says O.K. He's always been rather blunt and outspoken, but it doesn't bother me. The only time he really shocked me was when I was eighteen and he came home from college for vacation and said briskly, 'Let's go down and pick out a ring for you.' That was a proposal!" She looked affectionately at her husband. "But I went right along."

She not only went along, but started things rolling, when they met in Garfield High School in Los Angeles, in 1933. Gerry had come from Baden, Pennsylvania, near Pittsburgh, where his father was a brick contractor. When his parents, with his sister and brother, moved to a new section of Baden, Gerry discovered the new school didn't go in for football, and promptly went west to live with his grandmother, so that he might play on a good team. "I can see now that it was a drastic thing to do," he said. "Mother cried, but she didn't try to stop me from going. I was so nuts about sports that's all I could think of."

It was still all he was thinking of when he first saw Rosellen Jones in chemistry class, although a mild molecular reaction set in. "I thought, 'H'm-m-m, there's a good-looking blonde.' She was with a very noisy girl, and I liked Rosellen for being more reserved."

Under Miss Jones' reserved exterior, she, too, was molecularly aroused, only more so. "He was a letter man and a senior, and the biggest thing I'd ever seen." Rosellen, then a junior, lived in Los Angeles with her parents and brother; her father worked for a streetcar company, the Los Angeles Railways. Like Gerry, she was of German-Scotch-Irish descent, but with a dash of Welsh added, and it may have been the Welsh that provided the volatile fizz. When her best friend bet her that she'd never get a date with the big football star, Rosellen went into action. She slipped a note into the pocket of Left Tackle Dennerlein's football sweater, hanging over the back of his chair. It said, "You're always so sleepy in chem class. What's the matter—too much lunch?"

Gerry reports, "I was sort of intrigued, but I was sore too. What did she mean—sleepy? I was getting better marks in chemistry than she was!"

Soon the notes were being pocketed and unpocketed with the rapidity of squirrels dealing in nuts. Rosellen said, "My favorite from him was 'I don't own a car or a bicycle, or even a pair of skates, but may I come over anyway and see you, some night soon?'"

He came. Soon she was going to his grandmother's, and savoring the easier family atmosphere there, and the card games her own rigidly religious mother disapproved of. "And of course we went swimming." She brought out a photograph album to show a snapshot a friend had taken, of Gerry holding Rosellen aloft, in a gentlemanly manner. "I thought it was so daring I was careful not to let mother see it. And the day Gerry developed the negative in chem lab, I was too embarrassed to go to school, thinking, 'What if he's caught with it!'"

That fall, Gerry went off to St. Mary's College, near San Francisco, on an athletic scholarship that kept him humping, on and off the football field. Rosellen says, "I was having a fine time with other boys, but I'll admit I was hurt when I didn't hear a word from him."

Her husband chuckled. "Tell her what you said to my grandmother when you met her in the supermarket."

"Well, I just said airily, 'Oh, I feel sorry for any girl who has to marry him—him and his athletics.'"

It was swimming that brought them together again the next summer. Gerry was working at Cudahy's Packing Company as a beef lugger (an occupation heartily encouraged by the football coach) to earn money for his next year's expenses. On his day off, he had thriftily hitchhiked to Long Beach for a day's swimming, with fifteen cents for lunch. "I was just going to get a hot dog when I ran into Rosellen on the beach with her family. She looked great, but what really looked great to me was the big picnic lunch her mother had brought. When Mrs. Jones asked me to share it, that was music to my ears."

His wife said, "I've always suspected it was mother's lunch that did the trick. After that, he wrote all the time, and then he got a second-hand Model A Ford, and came down weekends. But there was never any I-love-you talk."

After the brisk ring-buying expedition, they announced their engagement at a family Christmas dinner at Lucca's restaurant, in 1935. Gerry said, "My family didn't take it very seriously. I guess they thought I was still more in love with athletics. But I'd already decided to teach. I think two things turned me that way. The fathers at St. Mary's were wonderful men and wonderful teachers. I wasn't a Catholic, but I certainly admired them. And then I got a fractured elbow, and I noticed that people who'd made a big fuss over me as an athlete dropped me right away when I was out of the games for a while. So I decided teaching was a better profession to count on."

Rosellen was having her own sobering thoughts; she had left Los Angeles college in her sophomore year, after her mother had a severe stroke, and was taking care of the invalid. "She was much too sick for me to be married at home, but she and dad gave us their approval, and then we eloped to Las Vegas in May of 1936."

Gerry said, "We hadn't told my grandmother, but she opened my mail and saw the marriage license, so she knew too." In spite of the bridegroom's total assets, $100, there were no loud family objections.

Rosellen wore a pink crepe dress for the ceremony before a justice of the peace. "No flowers—no friends there." After a weekend honeymoon at a motel in Boulder Dam, she went back to her parents' home. Gerry graduated a year later, soon after Darlene was born. "I'll never forget my first sight of that big football hero wheeling a baby carriage. It was so sweet."

To support his new family and finance his graduate work, Gerry went east to play professional football with the New York Giants. He's modestly reticent now about his sports laurels, but Rosellen mentions the All-Star games he played in. "He had to be gone four months that first trip, but he wrote me every other day, and his letters were so long and full of just everything he was doing. They meant so much to me that if I ever had to give them up it would be like tearing off a piece of me."

Her mother had died, and she was keeping house for her father, to whom she's devoted. Gerry was working toward his master's degree at the University of Southern California (where he has since done all his graduate work) and alternated these sessions with more money-raising bouts of football, with the Giants and L. A. Bulldogs. Meanwhile, he started his first teaching job in the fall of 1938, at San Jacinto. It wasn't a happy year for the young married couple who were finally together in a furnished apartment. Gerry said, "We quarreled a lot, but I blame most of that on myself, because I was under a strain as a new teacher, and coaching every night till six, so I was hard to get along with."

After getting his master's, and later his administrative credentials, in summer sessions, his next jobs were as principal and district superintendent. "We stayed in Kern County two years and I hardly got my nose out of the house," Rosellen said. "Darlene broke her arm, then she had scarlet fever followed by ten weeks of rheumatic fever. The two other girls had measles, and Carol was left with bronchitis. Then Darlene got desert fever—it's a miserable thing—and Carol caught it, too, so we had to move. We were living in a log cabin on somebody's farm—the only thing available—and was I glad to see the last of it!"

It was also in the log cabin that they had the worst quarrel of their married life. "Gerry had been holding up a neighbor as an example to me. He kept telling me day after day how hard she worked and how much she did. Finally I got fed up, and I served him breakfast one morning just as that woman would have done it. I didn't have on make-up, my hair wasn't combed, and I slapped down a cup of coffee without a saucer, and a messy blob of cereal. Gerry got so mad he threw the dishes on the floor and banged out of the house. Then he felt so penitent he bought me a new set of dishes. And that was the last I heard of that paragon."

In talking about any family flare-ups now, she said, "I've learned not to let it build up inside until it becomes a big issue. The girls and Gerry know how I feel, and they know where they stand. We all talk things out, and we try to take up the slack in each other's behavior. But sometimes when Gerry gets to pressuring me, I explode all over the place." She laughed. "Then he tiptoes off and spreads the word. 'Watch out! The lady's on the warpath.'"

"Well, I don't like anybody to be huffy at me."

His wife countered gaily, "Oh, but think how dull it would be if we never got huffy."

The daily schedule allows small time for dullness: when the alarm screeches at 6:10, Rosellen leaps into a robe and starts breakfast, while Gerry showers in the tiny extra bathroom he installed in the garage. (Kathy reports, "The plumbing moans and groans like a foghorn." Her father retorts, "But at least I get in there.") At 6:30, Rosellen calls the girls, and fifteen minutes later the family sits down to bacon and eggs, fruit, toast and coffee. Darlene says, "I go around like a sleepwalker. Dad's still teasing me about the times I forgot to put the top on the percolator, and the coffee spouted to the ceiling. And Kathy always coos to her parakeet during breakfast, and the rest of us sound about as sensible." The phone often starts ringing before 7 A.M., teachers calling Rosellen to report illness and asking her to arrange for a substitute before school opens that day. While this goes on, Kathy clears the table, Carol washes dishes, Darlene makes her parents' bed and straightens her own room. "At least that's the theory," her mother said, "but it's often left in a toss-up, because she's the first to leave the house."

At 7:35, Darlene, carrying a "reducing lunch" of fruit, leaps into the family's second car, a '39 Chevvy, "which might bring twenty dollars on the open market," and drives three miles to Long Beach State College. A few minutes later, the four other Dennerleins ride off in the opposite direction, in their '51 Hudson. Carol said, "Dad let me drive every morning while he was teaching me, but he says it took several years off his life." They drop Kathy first, at Rogers Junior High. Then Rosellen disappears through the shady loggias of the Fremont Elementary School. Carol gets off at Wilson High, and Gerry continues on to Polytechnic, where he teaches history and Social Living to classes averaging thirty students. (Long Beach, now fifth largest city in California, with a population of 379,000, has done itself proud on roomy, modern school buildings.) All four Dennerleins eat a soup-and-salad lunch in school cafeterias, and this accounts for $20 a month of food expenses. Sometimes Rosellen goes to a nearby lunch counter for her half-hour noon break "because I think it's a good idea to get a change of atmosphere."

Fremont, with 400 students from kindergarten through sixth grade, is an attractive, spacious, well-run school, but if you spend an hour in Rosellen's big office adjoining the principal's, you'll see how a little change of atmosphere might be restful. Teachers, parents and offspring stream in and out. Phones ring constantly. Rosellen moves tranquilly, a one-woman office force, from adding machine to typewriter to Mimeograph and back again. She even shows genuine enthusiasm when small students rush in to display such treasures as a baby shark in a fish bowl. Along with her secretarial work—typing letters, requisitions and a flow of reports—she's in charge of the textbook and record-album libraries and their inventories, prepares stencils for programs and bulletins, and works with the P.T.A. "They're a terrific group here. They get so much done." She is also receptionist, and coffee maker for the teachers' morning break. She says cheerfully, "I like the job because I can keep changing my pace all day. And my boss, the principal, Mrs. Darling, is wonderful. She really deserves her name."

Mrs. Darling, in turn, tells you, "Rosellen is tops. The youngsters like her as much as she likes them, and she's so efficient. She keeps her head no matter what."

Rosellen said later, "I'm almost never physically exhausted at the end of a day, but sometimes I get a kind of exhausted frustration, seeing all the things I'd like to do if I just had more time at home. But I try to shut my eyes and remember I'll catch up in the summer." (She painted every room in the house one vacation, and has made all the curtains.) "My mother was the sort who even scrubbed the front steps every day, and if I got like that I'd drive myself and the others crazy."

By 4:45, after a ride home with Darlene, she's watering the brilliant miniature garden she's green-thumbed in boxes her husband built bordering the front: an exuberant mass of hibiscus, angel begonias and pinks. She points out proudly the work Gerry has done on the exterior, to change it "from fake Spanish to real California." He latticed in the bare little on-the-sidewalk entrance patio, so that it's now a pleasant, sheltered porch. He also transformed an ex-porch into a workroom containing his books, filing cabinets and a rickety sewing machine. "The girls filed all my patterns as a surprise for me, and I can put my hand on anything now." Eventually she hopes to put her hand on a new sewing machine. "We're supposed to be saving for that and a garbage disposal—we never buy on installment—but we never seem to get the cash together."

There is certainly no stinting on food. Gerry prefers day-to-day marketing so that he can take advantage of advertised specials. "I even got fryers at thirty-five cents a pound." Because he learned about meat cuts at Cudahy's during the beef-lugger days, he feels that he gets good buys. "We usually have fairly inexpensive cuts of steaks or chops. The girls don't like leftovers and they won't even eat chopped meat."

They have two economy-minded favorites that are also fine for entertaining at buffet suppers on the sun deck. One is a rice pilau, from a recipe

The time to start taking vitamins is before you are born.

Your chances are much better, then, of arriving in a healthier condition. So suggest to your mother-to-be that she get enough vitamins. They'll help her, too.

The best way to buy vitamins is in the original packages manufactured by nature—in fruits, vegetables, eggs, milk, meats, fish and whole-grain cereals. People who do not eat enough of these protective foods may appear to be well fed, but they cannot do their best work and get the most pleasure out of living, because of vitamin deficiencies. Vitamin capsules or tablets taken daily as a diet supplement help to correct such vitamin deficiencies.

Look with distrust, however, on any suggestion of self-medication with vitamins to cure any condition. Do not run the risk of letting some serious disease go too long while you fool yourself by taking vitamins which may have nothing to do with your case.

No vitamin can cure disease of the nerves, bones, blood, liver, kidneys, heart or digestive tract except in certain cases which only a doctor can recognize and treat. If you are sick see your doctor. Let him use his skill and judgment to decide what you need.

For more information about a good diet and the proper uses of vitamins, ask your pharmacist for a free copy of the Squibb leaflet "Hidden Hunger."

Gerry's sister-in-law learned during a stay in the Orient. The other is Dutch sauerkraut: "Gerry uses spareribs with dill seed, and grated apple and potato."

Her husband said modestly, "It was your dish first," and Rosellen crooned, "But you improved on it so much."

He cooks most meats on the charcoal grill, while his daughters serve as helpers in the Delft-blue kitchen. In spite of the predinner bustle, and Rosellen's straightening the house, the women often get in a swim, and Gerry never misses a day. This undoubtedly whets his outsize appetite to new highs, and temptations such as grated potato pancakes and Carol-baked chocolate cake topped with ice cream leave you with a happily confused notion of Dennerlein dieting.

During the 5:30 meal, Joey the parakeet sits by the dining-room table supplying exotic color, and the nonfeathered members of the family supply the gusto for good food and talk. At a recent dinner, they discussed foreign-exchange students, and told how much they'd enjoyed a German boy Gerry brought home. Rosellen, glinting with amusement, persuaded her middle daughter to quote a student from the Middle East. Carol said, "Well, he only wanted to ask me the next day's assignment, but he addressed me as 'Oh, delight of mine eyes.'" Darlene gave her coined definition of "a girl who dates with hoods and wears too tight skirts. She's a hooda." Her father, giving his views on the purpose of education, quoted John Dewey's "The best educated man is the one who does most for others."

Afterward, while the girls did the dishes, Rosellen played Chopin, with a clear, nice touch, and said wistfully, "I think that's the thing I miss most now—my music. It's been a year since I really touched the piano. I used to play a half hour for Gerry every night before dinner, and I gave all the girls lessons, but they haven't practiced much. They sang as a trio in church, last Mother's Day, and I accompanied them." The Dennerleins are Presbyterians, but go to the Congregational church now because it's near. "But Gerry and I've been so busy Sundays lately we haven't even gotten there."

Her momentary air of harassment vanished when Darlene came in and played two charming melodies she'd composed. Soon all four females were giggling, as they described Gerry's rock-'n'-roll rebellion. "He hid all the Fats Domino records in with the towels," Rosellen said. "But I helped the girls search till we found them, and we played the whole lot while he was out, then hid them again so he wouldn't know."

Gerry said, "Ha, I knew all right, because they had on their victory smile." He pointed out reasonably that six hours straight of rock-'n'-roll on the scratchy little portable phonograph was really too much. "But the trouble is, one of them does something wrong and then all four get together and whip it around till it turns out I'm the culprit!"

Luckily, he and his wife have the same preferences on television: they both like plays. To preserve family peace, the girls have their own set in a bedroom. Carol, with a dead-pan expression, said, "And we almost never argue over the best seat and which program to watch. I would say not more than one fight a night."

What with homework, Rosellen's domestic chores, and Gerry's research reading done at a nearby library or at home, after an early evening walk, no Dennerlein seems in danger of TV-itis. Both Gerry and his wife take a deeply personal interest in the research project he's chosen for his doctorate dissertation: Factors Relating to the Measurement of Teacher Morale. They say, not bitterly but rather sadly, that too many communities regard (or disregard) teachers as low-salaried, unimportant minions, "instead of respecting them the way they do doctors or lawyers."

In spite of this, Gerry loves teaching so much that although he thinks he could get almost twice his current salary if he went back to administrative work, he wants to stay where he is. "Anyway, the administrative end always sends up my blood pressure."

Although Rosellen says frankly she regards her own job as temporary, "until I can afford to go back to my real job as a full-time housewife," she would never urge her husband into a higher-paying, nonteaching job. "And we don't believe in pressuring the girls either. We want them to get whatever is best out of their age group, and not feel driven, or overcompetitive." When her daughters wandered back in, during an intermission in homework, she said to them, "This is your chance to speak up and get in your licks. Tell what you don't like about us, as parents."

Kathy said, "I liked it when mother didn't work, because she was always here when I got home, and there were fresh flowers in all the rooms, and the smell of something nice cooking, and surprises like the furniture being changed all around. I'd rather she didn't work; but if she must, well, she must."

Darlene and Carol had only one criticism: "They're firmer than most parents. They keep closer tabs on us."

Gerry said later, "We're a close-knit family—maybe too much so."

In a rather troubled voice, he mentioned suddenly that the only life insurance he carries is a $1500 policy with the Teachers' Association. On the credit side, there's the retirement pay taken out of both their salaries each month.

Both Dennerleins take evenings out for school-faculty affairs, and Rosellen served a term as president of the Polytechnic Faculty Wives. They also support such community projects as the Film Forum and the Playhouse, and the famous Alamitos Bay Parade of Lights at Christmas, when all the boats in the area are decorated, and thousands of visitors come to see the brilliant spectacle. Gerry served one Christmas as chairman of the Program Committee, and his wife worked on decorations. Each New Year's, Rosellen's father and stepmother, come down from Puente to visit, and the Dennerleins often see Gerry's grandmother in Los Angeles.

Their vacations are spent on family camping-out trips—to Sequoia National Park, Kings Canyon and Mount St. Helen. Last summer, to celebrate their twentieth anniversary, Rosellen insisted that she and Gerry should go off by themselves for a week. "And I told him, 'Just for once, no sleeping bags!' We drove to Carmel, and the truth is it wasn't quite the satisfaction we'd planned. We kept saying, 'Oh, wouldn't the girls love this? What do you suppose they're doing now?' And we could hardly wait to phone them every night at six-thirty. Gerry said to me, 'Once a parent, always a parent. You and I worry about them, and they tell us they're having a ball!' But when we got home, we found a huge sign over the garage door. They'd painted Gerry's and my faces on the top, and in big red letters: WE'RE GLAD YOU'RE BACK. And oh, were we glad to be home." END

The skies are cloudless; the flowers all red and canary yellow; the birthday cake has come and gone. The guests are gathered about William, a crowd of three-year-olds.

"These presents are all mine!" says William fiercely. "You can't play with them!"

"William!" I say, shocked. The assembled mothers all smile that there-but-for-the-grace-of-God-goes-mine smile of the exonerated, while I add lamely, "These are your guests ——"

"But these are my presents, mummy." (The boy's not so dumb, I think proudly; but am forced to go on playing mother.)

"William!" I say, in my most meaningful voice. "Remember about Sunday school and sharing?" (Poor little boy! After all, they are his toys.)

William, undefeated, climbs down from a pile of rumpled birthday paper, ribbons and toy trucks. "O.K.," he says grandly, "they can have them. But it's my birthday, and they can't have that!"

. . . A wonderful exchange, my son: a cloudless day, with flowers all red and yellow. William's day.

Memo to: Barbara J. Subject: Wardrobe for Spring

Purchases for spring wardrobe since January...silk polka-dot dress, white knit cardigan, lightweight wool sheath and jacket, beige linen skirt and blouse, and beige tweed coat. Needed...

One Enchanting dress

How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing!

By BET HART

This sums up Barbara J.'s current fashion thoughts in a nutshell. Barbara always writes down (just in case you haven't suspected it long before) exactly what she has, and with this neat slip of paper in hand continues from there with her mental gyrations. Barbara may be purely hypothetical (we sometimes wish she weren't!), but her fashion calculating is very much in the realm of reality. Every purchase in the past has been made with utmost determination to be a true fashion investment . . . a blessing to Barbara's wardrobe as well as to her morale. What Barbara has reaped from these purchases is more than even she ever hoped for!

We think this time enchantment is matched by practicality, but amazingly enough (or perhaps not so amazing for Barbara) she comes up with exactly the kind of dress she is looking for. It makes a spring wardrobe complete!

ROGER PRIGENT

Dining out, Barbara wears the dress, shown here with its own white piqué cuff outlining the pretty neckline. The skirt is full, falling in soft unpressed pleats. Tiny tucks at the front are one more added detail. The fabric, Dacron and cotton, shows up its practical side. All these fashion points for a glorious $17.95!

Entertaining at home, Barbara adds her gay checked apron with a huge rose tucked into the waistband. Her new red sandals strike the same color accent . . . cost her all of $3.99. She also adds chalk-white jewelry to keep the colors basic and gay—red, white and black!

MARIBETH

Dancing is exactly what Barbara had in mind for the dress, and we think it looks prettier than ever on the dance floor! Here, removing the white piqué cuff shows up the other version of two pretty necklines. She adds a cotton-print sash (1 yard of fabric, 59 cents) tied for the ends to drift over the floating skirt.

Party at a friend's. Barbara wears her white sweater she made in January. The color accent this time: bright turquoise, her cummerbund she made last November. She wears her black suède pumps.

On a Sunday, a new costume—but the same dress. Barbara wears her coral bolero, short white gloves, and a new hat of tiny leaves and flowers . . . $2.98.

Spring Fashion $'s

Total beginning from January, $71.18. Add to this $25.51 for the black dress, red sandals, print sash and hat to make a total of $96.69... a spring wardrobe complete!

DAVID'S NEW GIRL

because if he was she was having a dance, a very small dance, and if he wasn't she'd ask someone else. I said the last I knew he would be here but that a letter had arrived this morning which I'd not had time to read and that I'd have to let her know.

At my back Mr. Dunstable coughed. I hung up and he said sorrowfully that there was nothing wrong with the furnace. It was the thermostat. He said we'd have to have a new thermostat. Luckily for us, he said, he had one on hand. Otherwise we might have had to wait weeks. As it was, he reckoned he could have the thing in by nightfall.

Gordon, looking harried, came home for lunch. The latest weather report had it that the temperature was going down to twenty tonight. If it did he might as well consider the broccoli a dead loss. He paced up and down the kitchen while I made sandwiches and more coffee. Farming, he said, was a backbreaking gamble. A foolhardy way to earn a living. Imagine anyone in his right mind trying to earn a living betting on the weather. If he had it to do over again he'd be a lawyer, doctor, dentist. Anything but this. And why wasn't the furnace on?

We ate our sandwiches huddled in front of the fire in the east living room and I opened David's letter:

Dear Ma and Pa: Will be home as planned late Wednesday night. Driving. Am bringing a girl home with me.

Later. She can't get away until Thursday A.M. Flying. Her name is Angela Cutler. See you soon. Love.

I handed the note to Gordon. I said, "Here we go again. Poor Sally," I said. "I wonder what this one does. All David's girls do something. Intensely," I said. "Remember the one who wrote? Nasty little verses about everybody she met. And remember the one who was studying insects and wouldn't let us kill the cockroaches the entire time she was here? I had to call in the fumigator after she left. Cockroaches," I said, "have the most astonishing habits of reproduction. Faster even than rabbits. I do wish David would settle down."

"I think David has settled down," Gordon said slowly, and read the telegram on note paper through again. "I think," he said, "this Angela has got him."

David isn't even Gordon's son, but he's always been right about him. I had David when I was nineteen and going to be an actress. I played understudy to Juliet for four weeks in a summer-stock company in Massachusetts and when it was over I eloped with the youth who understudied Romeo. It seemed like the most dramatic way to end a most dramatic summer. It was terribly romantic and irresponsible and utterly superficial. We were in love, but we didn't really like each other at all. When I found I was going to have David, Romeo's understudy took a job in a mining camp in South America because wives and children were not allowed. I went home to my parents and had David and got a divorce. I met and married Gordon when David was two and I think that is why Gordon has always felt closer to David than to any of our other children. He associates him with falling in love. David was there when the bells rang. The others weren't.

However, I felt that this time Gordon was carrying rapport a bit too far. I said so. I asked him what he was basing his preposterous assumption on. He said clairvoyance. I said never had David been less communicative about a girl he was bringing home. I said that always before David sent ahead enough information to compose an obituary. I reminded him that the only thing David had considered worthy of mention about this girl was her name. I pointed out that nowhere had he expressed the hope that we would like her and vice versa, a refrain which dotted his other similar announcements with the regularity of punctuation.

Gordon grinned and said I'd hit the nail on the head, that this time David didn't care whether we liked her or not; and as for the note's lack of salient details, what man, unless he's a poet and sure of it, ever attempts to describe his true love? "I may be wrong," Gordon said, "but I'd say we'd better get out the old family silver and start polishing it up."

"You've got to be wrong," I said hotly, "because already I don't like her; and besides, David is going to marry Sally—we've always known that—and besides, any girl named Angela is just not daughter-in-law material."

The telephone rang. It was Mother Blair wanting to know if David was coming home for Thanksgiving because if he was she wanted to invite Sally for Thanksgiving dinner. I said that David was coming home but that he was bringing a girl with him, that her name was Angela and that Gordon for some obscure reason was convinced David was going to marry her and that furthermore the furnace had died and the broccoli was going to, too, if it went down to twenty the way everyone said it would. I then took a deep breath and asked her how she was.

One of the nice things about Mother Blair is that she never tells you how she is. She said if the furnace wasn't going by tonight we could come to her house and that I wasn't to worry about David because he still had another year of college and that a lot could happen in a year. She said she would pray for the broccoli.

When Gordon left I reread David's letter, looking for some dot or dash that might have escaped me the first time, and decided that for once Gordon was mistaken.

Mr. Dunstable arrived with the new thermostat.

Bertha arrived bundled up in my old beaver coat and wanted to know what for I kept the house so cold. Didn't I know it was going to eeze tonight? When I told her about the urnace she started buttoning up my beaver nd said she'd do the dishes but then she'd ave to go. Said let her rheumatism flirt with is cold and there'd be nothing left of her. started to tell her that Mr. Dunstable was xing everything right at this moment when Mr. Dunstable returned from the basement o tell me that this wasn't the right thermostat fter all and that he might have to order one fter all though he'd try Mason's Hardware rst, much as he hated to do business with hem.

The twins blew in from school wanting hot hocolate, an apple, two sandwiches each and anting to know why the cooky jar was lways empty. Tuck said wistfully that if it ould just get a few degrees colder and then ain it would snow. I told them what would appen to the broccoli if it snowed and they ooked so solemn and concerned that I felt like shrew. "But if it should snow," I said, "we'll ake snow sherbet and a snowman and for- get about the broccoli." I hugged Johnny be- ause he likes to be hugged and patted the tubble top of Tuck's head because he doesn't nd they began talking excitedly about build- ng sleds. Did I happen to have any old run- ers around anywhere?

Mothers of identical twins seem to consider t a point of honor to declare that their twins are really nothing alike except physically. Johnny and Tuck are identical twins. the same people. Johnny is a little kinder than Tuck, but that's just because Tuck doesn't know how. He'd like to be. Tuck is a little more dependent on the good opinion of others, but that's because, not having Johnny's gift of kindness, he finds their good opinion a little harder to come by. They both are determined and they both like to build things and I was sure that, runners or no runners, by nightfall they'd have something you could lie on that would slide on snow.

Amanda telephoned from her friend Patricia's house. Casually she asked if the furnace was fixed and, on learning that it was not, as casually said she thought she'd stay at Patricia's awhile because Patricia had some divine new records.

Bertha, ever true to her word, washed the dishes and departed. She is definitely not the old family retainer I've been searching for all my married life. The house seemed awfully empty after she'd gone. Empty and cold. Downstairs in the basement the twins were dragging old crates around, a sound much like the scraping of fingernails across a blackboard.

I put on my coat and walked down to the corner store to look for something for dinner that would take no preparing, a minimum of cooking and would be tasty, hearty and hot. Mr. Corey suggested a leg of lamb, sweet-potato casserole and green peas fresh out of the pod. Beneath his scornful gaze I purchased several cans of baked beans, canned Boston brown bread and a box of frozen vegetables, and bit back the spineless impulse to explain to him about Bertha and the furnace.

Walking home through the early twilight, I thought again of David's note and of how it had been just such an evening as this when I'd walked from my parents' house to the hospital to have David. I'd walked because the pains weren't very compelling and the winter twilight was, and also because I was scared and wished to postpone as long as possible the moment when the hospital doors would swing shut behind me and I would find myself alone in a strange place with this new and devastating experience that everyone described as indescribable. It seemed only yesterday. David can't get married, I thought fiercely. He's still mine, I thought fiercely. Gordon is crazy, I thought fiercely, and banged open our front door. A warm blast of air met me and Mr. Dunstable's voice floated out to me from the west living room where he and Gordon were talking. Tuck, manfully trying not to look defeated, greeted me with the news that the latest weather report predicted warmer temperatures by midnight. Amanda—wearing, now that the furnace was functioning, wool slacks and a turtle-neck sweater, and her hair in a new way—called to me from the kitchen that she was cooking dinner: a leg of lamb she'd got out of the freezer, sweet-potato casserole and two vegetables. She also said that she'd just been voted "best-all-around girl" by the high-school yearbook committee, which I guessed explained this sudden and startling assumption of responsibility and possibly the hairdo which made her look too tall, too thin and awesomely capable. Slipping into the pantry to conceal my pitiful purchases on the shelf reserved for the boys' camp-outs, I wondered if this best-all-around business might not swing Amanda's choice of college away from the academically pure and emotionally pristine girls' college of her choice and more in the direction of the coeducational university which Gordon and I felt she needed. When I got to the living room I found Mr. Dunstable coming out. He looked frightfully jolly. The coffee table was covered with pamphlets proclaiming the charms of the new air-blowing, air-receiving furnace; Gordon, pencil in hand, was studying price lists. I said how could we buy a new furnace when we couldn't even afford new slip covers for the living room? Johnny brought in another log for the fire. The fire crackled. I took off my shoes and stretched out on the couch. In the kitchen Amanda dropped something. Across the hall in the east living room Superman told the twins to buy his brand of cereal now. Gordon smiled at me over the top of a furnace

The Picture of Health for April

by MAXINE DAVIS

In the early Spring my mother always did a big sales job trying to get the family to drink sassafras tea—and like it! When we squirmed and made faces, she'd tell us how much more tasty it was than that old-fashioned sulphur and molasses her mother forced down young and protesting gullets.

Our elders realized—as we do—that while the first sunny days give a happy lift to the spirits, winter sluggishness still persists.

Now, thank goodness, I don't have to stew the bark of a tree or struggle with a smelly mixture that may or may not be tonic. I have BEXEL Vitamins.

I give BEXEL to everybody in the house, from Gramp to the baby. Bexel vitamin-mineral capsules really do supply the nutritional elements that make the difference between feeling dragged down and ready to soar like the cardinals in our syringa bush.

We adults and half-growns take our BEXEL capsules gladly because we know what they do for us. The children like the bright little red ones, made especially for them, because they're like tiny Easter eggs—though sometimes they prefer their BEXEL in pleasant-tasting syrup. The baby burbles when she gets it in her formula. For all of us, BEXEL is a part of Spring.

With the bounce that BEXEL brings, you're looking forward eagerly to the Easter festivities.

The only cloud on the day of a party is remembering that as soon as it's the least bit warm you begin to perspire, especially under your arms.

You know that perspiration is a natural normal function. You guard your dresses daintily but nevertheless you fret because you know it's not—well—fragrant.

Actually, the odor doesn't come from the perspiration itself, as most people think, but from bacteria that flourish on it.

Well—I've investigated this problem, and find that the new YODORA is by far the best answer. YODORA is the newest idea in a deodorant. It's the only one compounded with an antibiotic (pertexol) which paralyzes those wretched bugs. It has a light cold cream base that soothes and heals any irritated surface, and a very delicate fresh evanescent scent that won't interfere with your new perfume. You can put it on, forget it until tomorrow, and have a wonderful time! The teen-agers help themselves to Mother's YODORA, and frequently.

With Easter holidays coming, they're likely to be more worried about their pimples and acne.

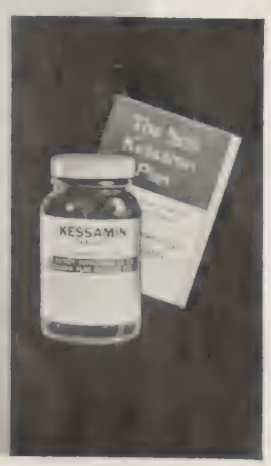
Personally I advocate a preventive program: the adolescent should begin to use UTOL as soon as she notices her first pimple spots and blemishes. For while we parents know there is no one treatment for acne we know too that UTOL not only helps the skin but also hides pimples, and therefore improves the youngster's state of mind, which is half the battle.

Suggest to your daughter that she smooth UTOL over her skin and put her make-up on over it. She'll be glowing at the Easter dances because she'll know her "spots" don't show! It's flesh-colored; your son can apply it without fear that anyone will notice it.

UTOL is an ointment, primarily antiseptic and antibiotic. It kills pimple germs, prevents new infections, relieves minor irritations and itching—and, that averts scratching which may cause permanent scars.

That's why they should also use UTOL routinely at bedtime. It's benencent all around the clock.

April showers bring May flowers all right, but first they bring wet feet, houses and clothes that are too warm or not warm enough, rough irritated throats, and voices and tempers that are anything but joyful!



This is the time when I check on my supply of NEO-AQUA-DRIN lozenges. I keep a couple of tubesful in the medicine cabinet and one in my handbag, and offer them like blessings. Their antibiotic content (tyrothricin) guards against lurking secondary infection and their anti-pain action makes communication normal instead of a nightmare. I wouldn't be without them!

Wonderful new way to win—and keep the slim figure of fashion

...the trim figure of health

McKesson offers a new Beauty Plan ...The Kessamin Plan...to help you lose 5 to 14 lbs., pleasantly, safely!

Have a new Beauty Figure for Spring—spend the Summer with a lovelier, slimmer you! Because here is a plan to help you reduce, safely, easily, pleasantly — and what's more, to keep your figure attractive and slender. It is called the Kessamin Plan for a "beauty figure."

The Kessamin Plan was compiled by a leading nutritional expert. It is safe for your health —and it really does work.

The Kessamin Plan helps you shed unwanted weight — without hunger pangs, without the nerves or fatigue that often go with losing weight —without any dangerous drug side-effects.

With the Kessamin Plan, healthful, enjoyable menus are supplemented with the almost magic formula Kessamin #14. These little tablets contain essential nutritional vitamins and iron to keep you feeling well, plus a neutral food additive that makes smaller food helpings seem quite enough. Thus, the Kessamin Plan helps you change over to better eating—painlessly—so you can easily prevent the return of excess weight.

It's guaranteed! Either you are pleased and happy with what the Kessamin Plan and Kessamin #14 do for you—either you win a new beauty figure—lose weight, and feel better—or your money back!

Ask your physician about reducing. Consult your druggist about the Kessamin Plan. Your druggist will tell you it is based on natural, normal, healthful processes. Your druggist will trust your confidence in wanting to lose weight. Along with your doctor, he is the man most concerned with your, and your family's health. As with other fine McKesson products, Kessamin is one more example of how McKesson "makes it better—so it's better for you."

catalogue—one of those married smiles that say, I like it here and how are you? I sighed contentedly. I told Gordon that after due consideration I'd come to the conclusion that for once he was mistaken about David. Gordon said he undoubtedly was, that it was just a feeling that he'd happened to have. I stretched and sighed again. The telephone rang. The long imperious ring that usually heralds a long-distance call.

It was David. He said he'd decided to stay over and fly down with Angela on Thursday. He said Angela was a perfectly marvelous girl and he knew we'd be crazy about her and vice versa. He said please not to plan anything because Angela was tired and didn't want to do anything. I went back into the living room and told Gordon happily that everything was going to be all right because things were beginning to run true to form again and that the only thing that wasn't running true to form was that apparently Angela didn't do anything.

Gordon looked relieved and said again that it had just been a feeling he'd had and again the telephone rang. Again the long imperious ring that usually heralds —— I ignored it and in a moment Tuck howled that it was for me and who did I know in Boston. "I don't," I said.

When the operator had made sure that I was Mrs. Blair, Mrs. Gordon Blair, Mrs. Gordon R. Blair and not some impostor, she said, "Here is your party," and a woman's voice with an accent that I can only describe as Eastern boarding school topped off by a year of European travel said that she was Mrs. Cutler, Mrs. Reginald Cutler, Angela's mother.

I murmured that it was nice of her to call and she said not at all. She said she'd only just learned that Angela planned to come to us over Thanksgiving and she wanted to be sure that it wasn't too much of an imposition. She said she'd never allowed Angela to visit without an exchange of letters between parents, but that it had all come up at the last minute and that Angela had been determined. "Young people today," she said, "are so impetuous, so headstrong. The amenities are, after all, important even in this day and age," she said crossly, but I felt she scolded Angela rather than me. Was I quite sure it was going to be all right? I assured her that it was and knew I didn't imagine the defeated sigh at the other end of the line. She added unconvincingly that she hoped someday we might meet and hung up.

When I got back to the living room Gordon asked me who I knew in Boston. I said that I knew Angela's mother and that she sounded terribly upper crust and terribly anxious about the amenities and a little anxious about Angela.

Amanda, coming into the room to announce dinner, wanted to know who was Angela. When we told her she said had we ever noticed that David's girls were never pretty but that they all had the most devastating sort of figures and didn't we think it rather vulgar of him? Then she said "Poor Sally" and I remembered that I'd promised to call Sally about her little party for a very few.

Sally said in a gay, tremulous voice that she hoped she'd meet Angela while she was here, that all the girls David brought home were always so interesting, and added after only the briefest hesitation that the party wasn't really going to be so very small after all and that after all she did want to meet David's friend and so did I think they would like to come? Friday night. Eight-thirty. At the club. I thought about Angela and how David had said she didn't want to do anything and I thought about David who probably wanted not to do just what Angela didn't and then I thought about Sally and I said that I was sure they'd love to.

Wednesday

I got up making lists in my head, which always means a depressing day. Clean curtains for guest room. Speak to Bertha about habit of shouting things from kitchen. Speak to twins about table manners. Ask Amanda please to be nice to Angela even if it turns out she has a devastating figure and isn't interested in anything. Suggest to Gordon that he not bring up the subject of segregation or any controversial subject until after Thanksgiving dinner. Polish the silver.

Bertha in one of her despondent moods. Her husband Harry drinking again. I decided it was not the day to speak to her about anything. On the bright side—her cooking, when she is despondent, is divine. At breakfast the twins nervously remind me that this is the day they are appearing as Pilgrim Fathers in the school auditorium at eleven. I decide to let the

MY FIRST JOB

LIFE PHOTO BY ALFRED EISENSTADT

By MARGARET BOURKE-WHITE

I lost my first job and cried bitterly over it. I had been working as a waitress for 40 cents an hour and needed the money to see me through senior year at Cornell. It was the luckiest thing that ever happened to me. It turned me to my camera.

With an old Ica reflex that my mother had given me, with a cracked lens, I started in as a free-lance photographer on the Cornell campus. To me it always has been breathtakingly beautiful. I took the Hall of Science on a winter night and made my own curving trails of footprints through the snow; a silhouette statue of Andrew Dickson White in front of Goodwin Smith Hall; a lacy picture of Risley Hall at dawn seen through layers of mist. I climbed to the top of the Library Tower and all over the ice around the waterfalls, frozen solid like great organ pipes. I was all over the campus taking pattern pictures.

From a local commercial photographer I rented darkroom privileges and worked night after night. I pulled myself through that last year by selling my pictures.

A slow elevator handed me my second lucky break, just before graduation. I'd been urged to take up architectural photography, and I went to see a prominent New York City architect for some unbiased advice. He was hurrying to catch a train, but the elevator was so slow I took out my portfolio and showed him a few pictures. When he saw the Library Tower he said, "Let's go back and look at them." Because of his encouraging words I opened up my own shop and went to work for myself.

table manners go. Amanda, having overslept, gulped a hurried breakfast, berated me for not having things better organized and galloped off to school, forgetting her lunch money and a notebook on which was inscribed "Personal, Keep Out." I decided Angela will just have to take her chances with Amanda.

There's rumor of another freeze on the way. Gordon came home late for supper and had to go out again right afterward to oversee placing of smudge pots and covering of broccoli. We drank hot milk in the kitchen at midnight and talked over the advisability of cutting down on broccoli next year and planting some hardier crop. We talked about Tuck and Johnny as Pilgrim Fathers. And about the Hazelton divorce, which I am all for and Gordon is all against. I decide if Angela can't handle controversial subjects it's just too bad. I did get clean curtains up in the guest room. Also polished silver.

Thursday

Much debate as to who was to drive to Charleston to meet the plane, in the midst of which David called from Charleston and said they'd caught an earlier plane and would take a bus over. Angela, David said, had never ridden on a bus and wanted to. "Never ridden on a bus!" Amanda howled. "Maybe," I said hopefully, "she's just never been anywhere before."

Mother Blair called to say she'd gone ahead and asked Sally, Angela or no Angela, and should she put her on one side of David and Angela on the other or separate everybody? I said separate.

Mother Blair called again and said she was having difficulty with the flower arrangements and should she put Dolly's widower on her left and the Reverend Crutch on her right as usual or could she just this once indulge herself by putting them both at the far end of the table? I said if Amanda would meet David's bus I'd be over shortly. I took the twins with me because they are enchanted by Mother Blair's house, which has a glass-brick front, a blue roof and a carport that is ideal for roller skating. Mother Blair built it six months after Father Blair died and the town couldn't have been more shocked if she'd taken on a lover. The old Blair house, which neither Gordon nor I wanted because it was even bigger and draftier than ours, was considered one of the handsomer landmarks in the town, beloved almost equally by the Bromley historical society and Father Blair, who loved it with a passion second only to his passion for guns and hunting dogs. Gordon and I still have long, inconclusive debates as to whether the new house symbolizes Mother Blair's inner self submerged by years of childbearing, child raising and a domineering husband whom she seemingly adored, or if it was simply her way of shedding the habits of a lifetime which had, in the absence of him who'd shared them for so long, become too painful to her. Perhaps the most revealing thing to be said about her is that no one will ever know.

This morning she was wearing one of a series of boxlike creations which she lovingly calls "house dimities." She greeted the twins abstractedly. She detests all children but her own and her own's own, because those are the only ones she feels free to treat as adults from the moment they can talk.

She didn't see, she said, why all this frenzied insistence on seating men next to women anyway. Men, she said, were conversational dullards over a plate of turkey and women would much rather talk to each other—married women, that is. She said, shepherding me into the dining room, that she wasn't a bit satisfied with the centerpiece as her chrysanthemums this year hadn't done too well and that what it needed—the centerpiece—was more body. She shoved a handful of place cards into my hand and said she did hope that this one of David's would be prettier than the last one and would have less brains or at least not make an exhibition of them as the last one had, especially if David was serious this time, though how he could be when Sally was such a darling and obviously adored him —— She said had I heard that the Hazeltons were getting a divorce and didn't I think it sad especially as there were no children—nothing more than an extended affair that ended badly, she said. Studying the place cards, I thought that there were times when I yearned for "nothing more than an extended affair"—with Gordon, of course—and realized there were two more place cards than places.

Mother Blair said the unset places must be those of the Reverend Crutch and wife, whom she hadn't wanted to ask in the first place but had felt she should because of dear Amy. Dear Amy had been the reverend's first wife and Mother Blair's dearest friend.

Reminiscing about dear Amy, Mother Blair set the two forgotten places while I juggled Sally, David and Angela, finally deciding in a burst of abandon to put Sally next to David and let Angela fend for herself between Gordon and young Fritz Blair, Roy and Margaret's oldest.

The twins and I got home just in time to see David and a tall blond girl in a fur coat alight from the station wagon which Amanda, for some reason, had driven around to the side door—the skates and rubbers entrance. The twins dashed ahead of me to greet David with a flying tackle.

People who don't realize that David isn't Gordon's son say that they look alike. They don't really: David is fair, Gordon dark; David tall, Gordon square-set. Until today I'd thought perhaps it was their smile, but today when David smiled at me over the top of the twins' heads I didn't see Gordon in it or even David. I suddenly saw Romeo's understudy back in the early days at the playhouse when he still believed in himself and in me and in love and I thought, startled, So that's what it was that happened to me! and then David scraped off the twins and was hugging me and smiling over the top of my head at the tall, thin blond girl in just the way he'd smiled at me and saying, "Ma, this is Angela!"

The girl was exquisite: straight honey-blond hair that swung back from her face as though blown by an invisible breeze, gray-green eyes said it was nice that she could come. She d it was nice of us to have her and that the s trip had been divine. The twins, to every-e's astonishment except Angela's, grasped r suitcases and started for the house.

David said, "Gee, ma, you're looking ind."

Amanda said, "Gee, David, you look astly. What have you been doing, sitting all night in an opium den?"

David said if she must know he'd acquired s special pallor languishing in the parlor of iss English's finishing school for girls. An-la blushed. Amanda gave me a look that id, A finishing school, yet; wouldn't you just ow it! and with the twins leading the way I ered everyone away from the side door and ound to the front where I hoped Angela uld see the silver bowl of chrysanthemums the table in the hall before she saw the ayed slip covers in the west living room.

Gordon, looking impatient, met us at the or. He had his gold watch in one hand and as wearing the righteous, inflexible look he ways gets when he's trying to herd us all mewhere on time. Didn't we realize, he id, that we were due at Mother Blair's this ry moment? I said, "Gordon, this is Angela utler, from Boston." Angela said, "Not oston; New York." She said mumsy had lled from Boston because mumsy just hap-ned to be there doing a poetry reading. manda gave me a look which said, Poetry ading, yet; wouldn't you just know it! and I ade up my mind to have a talk with Amanda out snobbery, about how there are all kinds id about how she is in danger of becoming me kind, maybe a snob's snob. Gordon ook Angela's hand and in his eyes I de-cted something akin to the twins' startled wakening and I thought, Well, she is pretty, t not that pretty.

In the hall Angela allowed David to take ff her coat and I was astonished to see that ne had no figure at all. Her ankles, her wrists, er hands were lovely, but she was as flat-chested and flat-hipped as a boy and much too thin. I looked at Gordon to see how he was reacting to this unveiling, but he hardly seemed to realize she'd been unveiled. He was still holding the gold watch, but only because he'd forgotten to put it away. He was telling Angela about the time David had saved Bobby Calhoun's life at Lake Hare one summer when they were twelve. I'd never heard him tell anyone the tale before and I listened fascinated as the lake grew larger and Bobby heavier and David more heroic by the moment.

David, looking utterly wretched, caught my eye. I tried to catch Gordon's eye, but his eyes, still with that look of startled wonder, were fixed on Angela's upturned face. It was Johnny who finally broke the thing up by the simple expedient of dragging Angela off bodily to look at his shell collection.

Thanks to Gordon and his drowning saga, we were the last to arrive. Mother Blair had held up the hors d'oeuvres until we got there so that we were greeted by a kind of chilly annoyance. Even Sally, who usually turned herself inside out to make people feel comfortable, especially David's girls, gave Angela one long frightened look of appraisal and took off to a small isolated love seat and played ostrich.

I looked around for young Fritz to cheer her up, but he was already hanging over the back of Angela's chair talking into her free ear. Her other ear was politely turned toward Dolly's widower who, looking more animated than I'd thought possible, was, I judged from the flailing motion of his arms, giving Angela a play-by-play description of his encounter twenty years ago with the English Channel. Gordon and David stood over this little tableau with the fatuous possessive air of sponsors at a giveaway show. I joined Sally on the love seat.

My relationship with Sally dates back to her fourth birthday party to which I took a miserably scrubbed and rebellious David. It has continued on much the same forthright level which on that occasion prompted her to ask me what made my tummy so fat and me to reply, "An unborn baby." Today without preamble she said, "This girl's different from the

LOTTE JACOBI

By MARGARET MEAD

At twenty-three I arrived in Pago Pago with a typewriter, a metal strongbox, notebooks, camera, a baby pillow, a few clothes and $4.50. And the Samoans. My assignment: find out how Samoan girls grow up. I'd only just emerged from girlhood myself! Now I had a fellowship grant from the National Research Council and this advice from my professors: "Don't waste your time doing regular ethnology." So I had no model to follow; and suddenly what seemed wonderfully adventurous in prospect became in fact somewhat frightening.

Over and over in those first weeks I said despairingly, "I can't do it." One day I said it in Samoan. That was the turning point. I never said it again.

I lived in the ramshackle Pago Pago hotel and wrote my family not to worry "as there are only missionaries here." Later I learned it was the hotel about which Somerset Maugham wrote "Rain"! I went to live in the village of the Turtle and the Shark where I slept beside the chief's daughter on a pile of mats, and became "Makelita." I was accepted as just another girl. I learned to eat raw fish with my fingers, weave garlands and baskets, go torchlight fishing, walk barefoot over the reefs at night.

That first field trip was the basis of my book, Coming of Age in Samoa, and it is still more real to me than the eight others I have taken. Each detail stands out sharply; the smell of coconut or bananas brings back with a rush the voices chanting, the soft clapping of hands at twilight.

I was never homesick in a Samoan house. I know, and cherish the knowledge, that if I were ill or disabled I could still go back thirty years later and the children of Ufuti, my "brothers and sisters," would take me in.

Mirror, mirror on the wall, who has the least sub-cutaneous tissue of them all?

Hunt-for the best

RISOTTO WITH SHRIMP
(A Rice Dish)

"Here's a dish your family will love! Rice with shrimp and the wonderful, rich flavor of Hunt's Tomato Paste. Hunt's is the real thing, just like home! It makes such a difference in my recipes, I hope you'll follow this advice: when you cook Italian-style, use Hunt's Tomato Paste, for sure!"

- ¼ cup olive or salad oil
- 1 chopped onion
- ½ cup chopped green pepper
- 1½ cups uncooked rice
- 1 can Hunt's Tomato Paste
- 2½ cups chicken stock or bouillon
- 1½ teasps. salt
- ¼ teasp. pepper
- ½ teasp. thyme or crumbled sweet basil
- 2 cups cleaned, cooked shrimp

Heat oil in heavy pan that has tight lid. Fry onion and green pepper in hot oil until golden. Add rice; cook and stir only till lightly tanned, not brown. Mix rest of ingredients except shrimp. Stir into rice. Cover tightly. Turn heat to lowest position. Simmer without raising lid or stirring for 30 minutes. Stir in shrimp. Add ½ cup sliced mushrooms, ripe olives or cooked peas if you like. Cover and heat 10 minutes. Makes about 4 servings.

thers." Her voice held a despairing note and thought, David and his capricious taste! I nought, Oh, well, by next Thanksgiving we'll ll look back on this as David's "beautiful-face ra."

I said, "You look especially pretty today nd what's this I hear about the rush you've een getting from Bruce Carter?"

Sally said crossly, "Oh, him!" Whereupon David, having torn himself away from the ableau, sat down between us and, putting an rm around each of us, said smugly, "Well, irls, what do you think of her?" But he didn't vait to find out because just then "her" waved nd David leaped to his feet and charged cross the room to her. I think I knew then, ut I managed to bury the knowledge under wo helpings of turkey, one each of plum pudding and pumpkin pie, an indiscriminate ssortment of fruit and nuts and afterward heartfelt lecture to the twins on overeating.

The remainder of the afternoon passed in merciful blur of televised football and a game of Monopoly, at which the twins took me for everything I had and a lot that I didn't. Angela and David, who had disappeared with the station wagon as soon as we got home, ut in an appearance at sundown just long enough to change clothes and then they were gone again, this time in Gordon's car.

I'm sure it was midnight when I dreamed I heard the car turn into the drive and hours after that when David knocked on our door. His hair was tousled and he'd made no attempt whatsoever to remove the lipstick that scarred cheek and ear like pastel war paint. He looked pale and hollow-eyed and hideously wide awake and he smelled of perfume. I shook Gordon to partial life and he and David lit cigarettes and took three puffs by actual count before David said that he supposed this could wait until morning. I said it already was morning and David said that he and Angela were engaged.

I said, "But, darling, we hardly know the girl"; David said, "That's why I wanted her to come home with me, so you could get to know each other"; Gordon took another considered puff of his cigarette and said, "Engaged, eh?"; David flushed and said well, he hadn't got her a ring yet and her family didn't know yet but they were in love and wanted to get married and wasn't that about as engaged as you could get? Gordon allowed that it was but I, thinking of Romeo's understudy, said that love could be an awfully tricky business. "Sneaks up on you, doesn't it?" David said. "One day you're safe and sound as an empty bank vault and the next ——" He grinned and snapped his fingers. "Never thought it would happen like that," he said and shook his head wonderingly. I said that that wasn't what I'd meant; I said that I'd meant "tricky like a fox." David looked blank and Gordon said, "Go easy, Janet," and David said, "Gee, mom, I thought you'd understand. I thought you'd be happy for me." I said, "Give me a little time." I said after all he had brought home a number of girls before, but this was the first one he'd got engaged to and it would take a little time. I said, "And what about Sally?" David said, "What about her?" Gordon gave me a withering look and David said that Sally was a peach, a grand girl, one of his best friends, but what did she have to do with this? "Oh, men!" I howled and Gordon said, "A callous lot, all of us," and grinned at David and said, "Well, congratulations, son. I think your Angela is quite a girl." David grinned back at him and said, "Thanks, pop."

Feeling left out of the festivities, I said, "What are her family like?" David lit another cigarette and said they were grand. Just grand. They lived at Aenead-on-the-Hudson in a funny old house with cupolas. He said I'd be crazy about Angela's mother because she did things—wrote poetry and gave readings and put on dramatic skits. Gordon said, "Look, son, I've got to get some sleep." I said, "What does her father do?" David said he was a stockbroker and I said, "I better get some sleep too."

As soon as David had gone I said, "Wherever did David get the idea that I liked people who did things?" Gordon said that he'd once known a lady who gave poetry readings and that she wore little-girl peasant skirts and little-girl peasant blouses but that the blouses were cut very low and she wore nothing under them. I said, "Oh, well, David has another year of school. A lot can happen in a year." Gordon said he wouldn't count on it and put out his cigarette, put out the light and turned on his stomach. I said how could he sleep when David's whole future was at stake? Gordon said how could he sleep with me talking

LOTTE JACOBI

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

My first job would have been teaching, but I flunked my state teachers' exam in English. So I went to work for the Women's Suffrage Movement in Buffalo, New York. It was a varied, colorful life for a minister's daughter. I do not think any movement from those days to this has been carried forward with so much energy and imagination. We were dedicated to the idea of keeping "Votes for Women" before the public by every conceivable means. At country fairs we tried to drown out sideshow barkers. In pulpits we promoted the temperance movement. In beer halls we pointed out that where women were allowed to vote, the liquor trade was permitted to continue. We were the workingman's friends, and our political power would strengthen the unions. On the other hand, women were natural conservatives, we told businessmen. We were for peace; but when our country went to war, we were ardent patriots. We never heard of psychological warfare—but we practiced it. We were radicals, liberals and reactionaries; raving beauties and plain as pikestaffs; demanding the vote or sweetly pleading for it. Leaders, speakers and organizers, paid and unpaid, came from every social group and embraced as many political and social ideas as there are in the nation—and as many types of women.

To those of us who did it as a full-time job it was an extraordinary experience, an education in politics, publicity, public speaking, organization and an insight into every variety of the human condition; and for me, a natural steppingstone to the field where by then I knew my chief interest lay: journalism.

to him? I said, "The trouble is that I don't even like her." I said, "The trouble is I think she's cold and spoiled and I'll never understand her in a million years." Gordon said, "The trouble is your boy has turned man and it hurts." He turned the light back on and got into my bed and said, "You know, it's funny your saying those things about Angela, because they are just the sort of things my mother said about you the day I brought you home to meet her." I cried that I didn't believe it, because his mother liked me. I was sure she did. Gordon said, "Of course she did, she's crazy about you. That was a long time ago." I wiped my eyes with the sleeve of his pajama and said I guessed I wasn't being very civilized about things. Gordon said he liked uncivilized women the best and turned off the light.

Friday

Got up determined to get to know Angela, but had the feeling that this would be much easier had David left her at Aenead-on-the-Hudson and just given us his version. She slept late and David went out to the farm with Gordon to see the new irrigation system, leaving detailed instructions: Angela liked her coffee strong, her eggs scrambled, her toast dry and would I please keep the twins out of her hair until she'd had her coffee—not that she didn't like them, quite the opposite—and speaking of hair, would I say something to Amanda about that new Edith Sitwell hairdo of hers before Angela got the idea she was an intellectual snob and would I also please call Sally and tell her they couldn't get to her dance because, well, because they couldn't and why had I told her they could in the first place when he'd specifically told me that Angela didn't want to do anything ——

I called Sally and told her that Angela had a sore throat, and as soon as I heard signs of life from the guest room I told Bertha about the strong coffee and the eggs scrambled and the toast dry, to which Bertha retorted that she always liked people that got up in the morning.

When I finally located Amanda her hair was down again but her intellect was not. She was sitting on the window seat in the dining room reading Proust and taking notes in a small leather notebook. I said maybe after breakfast she'd like to drive Angela around and show her the town. Amanda said she couldn't imagine Angela's being interested in anything except the shops. I said, "Amanda, dear, there are all kinds of snobs and they're not all of them ——" Amanda said, "I know, mums, sometimes I think I'm really the worst kind of all"—she smiled sheepishly—"the compensation snob." I hugged her gratefully. Angela appeared, looking tired and anxious and, when she found David had deserted her, utterly forlorn. She said, "No eggs, thank you, just coffee." Bertha angrily brought in the eggs anyway and the twins came in in football helmets and devoured them. As a token of their gratitude they asked Angela to referee a scrimmage in the front yard.

The telephone rang. It was Mother Blair. Didn't I think the dinner had gone off very well, considering, and had I noticed how the men flocked around David's "little friend" and how did I explain it? I said she had a lovely face and Mother Blair snorted and said the woods were full of lovely faces and that a lot of them had figures as well and something to say and had I noticed that Angela had not uttered more than two words all day and yet she always seemed to have someone talking to her and how did I explain it and was David really serious about her and just what was the girl's background? Not wanting to go into poetic readings and the stock market, I said she went to Miss English's finishing school in New Jersey. Mother Blair snorted again and said she looked finished enough to her; and by the way, when was Amanda going to get herself a beau? I said crossly that there were several boys who asked her to go to the movies with them and football games but that they were for the most part awfully young and they bored her. Mother Blair sighed and said, "The unfortunate thing is that she'll not find the older ones any less young or boring," and hung up. When I returned to the dining room Amanda was asking Angela what she was majoring in at Miss English's and Angela was saying French and homemaking. Amanda let this pass with uncharacteristic grace and Angela asked her what she was going to major in. Amanda said she hadn't absolutely decided yet between physics and creative writing but she rather thought it would be physics, as creative writing you can do on your own if you really want to badly enough. Angela said she thought it a shame for a girl as attractive as Amanda to bury herself in a laboratory, though maybe she had a point, as there would be a lot of men buried there with her and practically no women. Amanda, with a withering look at me, said she wasn't going to college to man-hunt; that she was, in fact, going to a girls' college just for that reason. Angela looked blank and the telephone rang.

It was New York calling for Miss Angela Cutler. Angela, looking suddenly pale, said, "I suppose it's mumsy." I said I supposed it was. She said, "I suppose David told you . . . about us, that is." I said that he had and that I just hadn't had the opportunity to tell her how —— She interrupted me by saying rather stiffly that that was quite all right and rather stiffly walked out to the telephone which was right outside the dining-room door. At the telephone she said "Hi, mumsy," and I said to Amanda that we mustn't eavesdrop and Amanda said "Sh-h-h!" and Angela said, "Yes, mumsy, the trip was fine," and "No, mumsy, I didn't bring my raincoat but I honestly don't need it," and "How are you and dad?" and suddenly, breathlessly, "I know three minutes are up but there's something I've got to tell you. Something terribly important about David and I, I mean me . . . we, he, I ——" Amanda said, "Don't tell me they're engaged or something like that." I nodded and Angela said, "Please, mumsy, try to understand, I'm a big girl now, a woman practically and —— Of course I love him, why else —— But I can't wait until I get home to talk it over, because it's already happened —— No, not yet, but he's going to cash in some war bonds." There was a long silence and presently Angela said, "What do you mean, our kind of people? I'm sure you and dad —— He's a farmer and she's just darling; I'm sure you and dad —— Please, mumsy, don't cry . . . pleeese ——"

Quietly I shut the dining-room door and Amanda said it sounded as though the Cutlers weren't any happier about things than we were. I said hotly, "Who said we aren't happy about things! After all, if it's what David wants ——" Amanda said, "But we hardly know her." I said that that would take time. Amanda said what about poor Sally and I said poor Sally would just have to manage somehow. Amanda shrugged and said, "Oh, well, he can't get married until he graduates; a lot can happen between now and then," and I said, "I wouldn't count on it," and went in search of Angela, who had never returned.

I found her sitting cross-legged in the middle of the guest-room bed lighting matches and blowing them out. The gray-green eyes were flooded and the beautiful mouth trembled. She said, "I suppose you overheard." She said, "I knew it wouldn't be easy, but I didn't think it would be this bad!" A few tears spilled over and wandered down her cheeks. She said, "I mean she might at least be civilized about it!"

Burning with shame, I said, "There, there."

More tears spilled over and she said, "I mean I would like to be happy on the happiest day of my life and now it's ruined—everything is ruined."

The front door slammed and David bellowed for Angela. In one lightning motion she was up and off the bed and in front of the mirror dabbing at her eyes with the sleeve of David's shirt, running a comb through her hair. David bellowed again and this time she answered him in a voice that was like the opening bars of a song.

If there were any tears left in her eyes, they resembled stars, and the face she turned to greet David looked as though it had been dipped in sunshine. David, looking like a small boy who's been caught by the truant officer, said, "Amanda tells me your mother called."

Angela, still with that opening-bar voice, said that she had. I bit back a compelling impulse to get out the adhesive plaster, a lollipop and a story I used to tell David whenever he got hurt, about Mighty Mouse and the Invisible Pain. David said anxiously, "Did you tell her?" Angela sang that of course she had. David moaned, "Well? How did she take it, what did she say?" I looked at Angela hopelessly, but she wasn't looking at me. She was looking at David and her eyes were as wide and candid as forget-me-nots.

"Say?" said Angela. "Why, just what any mother would say on the happiest day of her daughter's life—why, she was even more excited than I was—so that settles it. Makes it official. Isn't it marvelous!"

David agreed that it was indeed marvelous, but I wasn't so sure. Things were moving too fast for me. It was one thing to have your son fall in love with a lovely child, but quite another to find that she was just as adept at administering adhesive plaster, lollipops and stories about Mighty Mouse as you had ever been.

Sunday

Gordon and the twins drove David and Angela to Charleston to the airport late this afternoon while I stayed home ostensibly to prepare supper for the twins, who are going to an acolyte meeting, and for Amanda, who is going to Patricia's to work on her dead frog for biology because she can't work on it here on account of the twins who bawl like babies and call her a cannibal. I barely waited for the car to get out of the driveway before climbing into a wrapper and collapsing in front of the living-room fire with a whodunit. Amanda drifted in looking wistful and asked me if I thought they would be happy—"really happy, I mean." I said nobody was really happy or unhappy any more; they were either adjusted or they weren't. Amanda said, "But you and daddy aren't adjusted." I said "Rubbish." I said that marriages were like icebergs: three quarters submerged, and no one ever knew what really went on beneath the surface except the people involved. Amanda said she wondered if Angela knew that when David first waked up in the morning he looked positively repulsive and that she really thought people should see each other when they first wake up before deciding anything. I put down the whodunit and said crossly that when people loved each other enough to want to see each other when they first waked up they loved each other enough to get married. Amanda said I needn't sound so scared as she had no intention of having an affair before she got married if that's what I was scared about. "Affairs," she said loftily, "went out with the twenties. And what," she said, "are we having for supper?"

The telephone rang. It was Sally and she sounded as though she had a very bad cold. She said that she'd just heard something and could she come over and talk to me for a few

GREET EASTER

Enjoy the goodness of old-fashioned butter flavor in a luxury cake you make from Betty Crocker's own recipe!

Light and soft and pink as a sunrise, this is the cake for happy Easter celebrating. It's a love of a cake—so rich with butter you just can't make it from a mix. And it's high and tender because you've made it with soft . . . soft . . . Softasilk Cake Flour. Even if you sifted ordinary flour 12 times it couldn't be so light—so fine-textured. This is the flour to make the cake to do you proud this Easter. Betty Crocker

EASTER DAWN CAKE — A light, buttery, pink-marbled cake

⅔ cup soft butter
1¾ cups sugar
2 eggs
1½ tsp. vanilla (such as McCormick or Schilling)
3 cups sifted SOFTASILK
2½ tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. salt
1¼ cups milk
Red food coloring (such as McCormick or Schilling)
¼ tsp. peppermint flavoring (such as McCormick or Schilling), if desired

Heat oven to 350°. Grease well and dust with flour 3 layer pans, 8 x 1½" or two 9 x 1½". Beat butter, sugar, eggs, vanilla 5 minutes, high speed on mixer or by hand until fluffy. Sift flour, baking powder, salt. Add in four additions alternately with milk. Start and end with dry ingredients. Blend on low speed JUST until smooth. Pour ⅔ of batter into prepared pans. To rest of batter add red food coloring and peppermint flavoring. Pour here and there over plain batter. Cut through batter with knife several times for marbled effect. Bake 30 to 35 minutes. Frost with Betty Crocker Fluffy White Frosting Mix tinted with red food coloring. For those who like lots of frosting, use 2 pkg. frosting mix.

A soft...soft...

You'll bake a softer, lighter, lovelier —richer cake with soft . . . soft . . . Softasilk Cake Flour because it's made from special wheat that can absorb more shortening and sugar.

WITH THIS COLORFUL NEW SOFTASILK BUTTER CAKE!

minutes. I toyed with the notion of telling her that the something she'd heard was all too true and that she could cry on my shoulder tomorrow, please, and heard myself saying, "Of course; come right over and eat a pickup supper with us." I hung up, inwardly cursing David for not tending to his own broken hearts, and the telephone rang again. It was Bernice Hazelton, of the divorcing Hazeltons. She said she just absolutely had to talk to somebody and could she come over for just a few minutes? There was something she just had to get off her chest or she'd go mad. I toyed with the notion of telling her that I'd had just about all I could take of both requited and unrequited love for one weekend and heard myself telling her to come over and eat a pickup supper with us. I'd barely started "picking up" supper when the telephone rang. It was Gordon calling from Charleston. The plane was grounded on account of the weather and should he leave Angela and David there to wait for a flight that might not materialize until morning or should he bring them back? They, he said, wanted to stay, but did I think that was a good idea? I said that I thought it was the only good idea I'd heard in the last two hours but that I doubted if Mrs. Cutler would agree with me and so he'd better bring them back and we could all have a pickup supper.

5:30 P.M. Sally arrived. She looked as though she had a very bad cold. She blew her nose and said was it true that David was engaged? I said it began to look that way and took her into the kitchen and sat her down with a bowl of peas to shell. I hadn't planned to have peas. She said did I think that this time he was really serious? I said I rather thought so. She blew her nose and said, "What has she got that I haven't got, Mrs. Blair? I mean, not that I'm any raving beauty or anything—but ——" I said, "You're one of the prettiest, most attractive girls in Bromley, or anywhere around, for that matter, and you'd be a silly goose to waste one more moment brooding over a stupid oaf who hasn't the sense to appreciate you." She said David wasn't an oaf and he wasn't stupid and she'd never care about another boy again as long as she lived, and she didn't think she'd stay for supper, thank you, because she wasn't the least hungry.

6:00 P.M. Bernice arrived looking as though she had a very bad cold and before she'd as much as taken off her gloves wanted to know if we were alone. I said Amanda was around somewhere and shut the living-room door. As soon as the door was closed she burst into tears and sobbed that the most terrible thing imaginable had happened. I murmured that I was sorry and she blew her nose and said she probably shouldn't have come because there really wasn't anything anybody could do and her first impulse—which, she said, had been to cut her throat—was undoubtedly the only solution. While I wondered impatiently if Bernice had actually, as some of her lesser friends had rumored, left John for another man and if the other man had now —— Or if John, as some of his lesser friends had rumored, had —— Bernice got up and checked the door, sat down and said that none of it would ever have happened if John hadn't come back to pack his things. She wanted to pack them herself, she said, and send them to the hotel by taxi, but John, she said, had a mania about anyone packing for him. It was one of the things, just one of them, that had always driven her mad—that and his mania for making lists. He not only made lists, she said, of the things he had to do but he also made lists of the things she had to do. It made her feel, she said, like an employee. She paused for breath and I reminded her that John had come home to pack his things. She sighed and said, rather breathlessly, that if only he'd come in the morning like any normally estranged husband, but no, he had come at ten o'clock at night. "At ten o'clock at night, mind you," she said and stopped and I saw to my utter astonishment that she was blushing. Wondering what all this maidenly modesty had to do with the most terrible thing imaginable, I ventured a timid "And so ——"

"And so," Bernice said, "after ten years of marriage and within a month of divorce I am going to have a baby. Have you ever heard of anything so sordid in all your life?"

6:30 P.M. The living-room door opened with a crash and the twins, back from Charleston, catapulted in shouting why was I hiding and what were we going to have for supper and "How-do-you-do Mrs. Hazelton" and "Do we really have to go to acolytes' meeting now that it's so late?" Bernice said that I was an angel to listen to her troubles and thanks so much for the advice and that she didn't think she'd stay for supper, thank you, as she never felt like eating any more and fled, leaving her gloves and two very damp handkerchiefs.

10:00 P.M. I fell into bed. In the next bed Gordon read the stock-market reports aloud to me, and said it looked as though broccoli was going to bring a good price this year. He said did I think that if David married Angela he'd still want to live in Bromley and be a farmer? When I didn't answer he said he thought he would, as David underneath it all was a very stable boy. He said and what did I think of Angela now that I knew her better? When I didn't answer he said he thought she was quite a girl. He said he never had thought Sally was right for David. He said and what was Bernice doing here—crying on my shoulder? When I didn't answer he said the whole trouble with Bernice was that she was cold. I didn't answer and pretty soon he said—at least I think he said, though I very well may have dreamed it—that he hoped David would bring Angela home for Christmas.

Dear Mrs. Blair: Angela tells me she had a really delightful time over Thanksgiving.

You and Mr. Blair were good sports to take her in at the last moment. As you've undoubtedly gathered, our young people seem to have taken quite a fancy to each other, though they are of course much too young (Angela has just had her nineteenth birthday) to take themselves as seriously as they seem to wish to. We can't entirely ignore the situation and Mr. Cutler and I would be most pleased if you and Mr. Blair could pay us a visit your next trip north. We always go to Florida in January, but any time after that until June you will find us in residence.

Thanking you again for your kindness to Angela,

Sincerely yours,
DENISE CUTLER

Dear Mrs. Blair: It already seems, like simply aeons ago since I was in the sunny South. It's snowing here.

I don't know how to tell you what a marvelous time I had and it wasn't all just being with David and getting engaged. Which reminds me that he brought me my ring last night, an amethyst because I've never liked diamonds. It is perfectly beautiful. David has such marvelous taste, along with everything else.

Well, I better get to my homework. Thanks for everything. I think your whole family is just marvelous.

Sincerely yours,
ANGELA

Dear Folks: Back at the old grind but just want to say thanks for being so grand about everything. I can see now that it must have been quite a shock—old carefree me falling in love etc. Which reminds me Angela's ring cost a little more than I'd expected. If you could see your way to lending me a spot until Christmas I'll pay you back then. I'm taking a job afternoons in the college bookshop. Punch the twins for me and tell Amanda Angela thinks she's going to be a knockout someday.

Love to all,

Dear Mrs. Cutler: We loved having Angela with us and all of us think she is a darling. Am only sorry the visit was such a short one.

Your suggestion that we visit you our "next trip north" is a delightful one. Unfortunately we get north only too seldom. However, if you are driving to Florida in January, we are not very far out of your way and would be only too pleased if you could plan to stop over with us for a day or two.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Mrs. Blair: Thank you for your note and kind invitation. Frankly, I am at present deeply distressed about Angela. She has written that she wishes to announce her engagement at Christmas. In view of the fact that she is so very young (she has just had her nineteenth birthday) and that David has still another year of school Mr. Cutler and I feel that this is a bit precipitous and feel sure that you and Mr. Blair will agree. However, I can't seem to get through to Angela any more

David, dear: Your father's name is Albert ings. He was the only son of a widowed ther who adored and indulged him outgeously. He was an extremely attractive and arming and talented young man with little no sense of responsibility or direction. He s young. I was young. Neither of us was ge was a childish fiasco and I wouldn't have ssed it for anything in the world.

Several years ago I read in a New York per that an Albert Goings produced the ested in the theater and married the ughter of a wealthy Brazilian plantation ner, so that it is possible that this was

Dear Ma and Dad: Never having been the udlin type, the amethyst brooch leaves me th little to say except thanks and God bless
u. So, "Thanks and God bless you."

Seems there's some ferment about an engagement party because the Cutlers always go to Florida in January and start closing up the house right after Christmas and would rather have the party when they get back in the spring. Angela and I say never mind party, but they want to make a to-do and she is their only child etc. so I may be home for Christmas after all. But here's the thing. Don't know whether or not I've ever written to you about Raoul but in case I haven't he's a French exchange student (from Marseille) and before Angela and I got engaged etc. I had already asked him to come home for Christmas with me because he hasn't anywhere to go for Christmas and I didn't think you and dad would mind one extra. The honest truth is that I forgot all about asking him until this business of Christmas on the Hudson came up and he said to forget my invitation to him as he understood etc. how things were etc. so I naturally said you and dad were counting on him etc. I mean he looked so beat I had to. So could you write him a note, I mean if it's all right with you, and invite him. His name is Raoul Fuguet. His father was Resistance and his mother is a novelist and he's a four-square guy, tops in his studies and an ace track man. Frankly, I've kind of had him picked out for Amanda. However, if it works out I'm not coming home and it looks like too much just say so and I'll find an out.

Your grateful son,
DAVID

P.S. Thanks, dad. For everything.

We are often sorrier for others than they are for themselves.

Dear Mrs. Blair: Thank you for your letter of the twelfth. I do understand how you feel about writing anything to Angela at this point that she might interpret as interference. Why is it that the young don't realize that it is only their welfare that concerns us? I feel sure that you will be pleased to learn that the young people have decided to wait until spring to announce their engagement.

In the meantime Mr. Cutler and I plan to go to Florida the first of January and will be more than pleased to take you up on your kind invitation to stop over in Bromley for a day or two. If there is a hotel or inn nearby perhaps you could make reservations for us for the night of January fifth.

Looking forward to meeting you and your family,
DENISE CUTLER

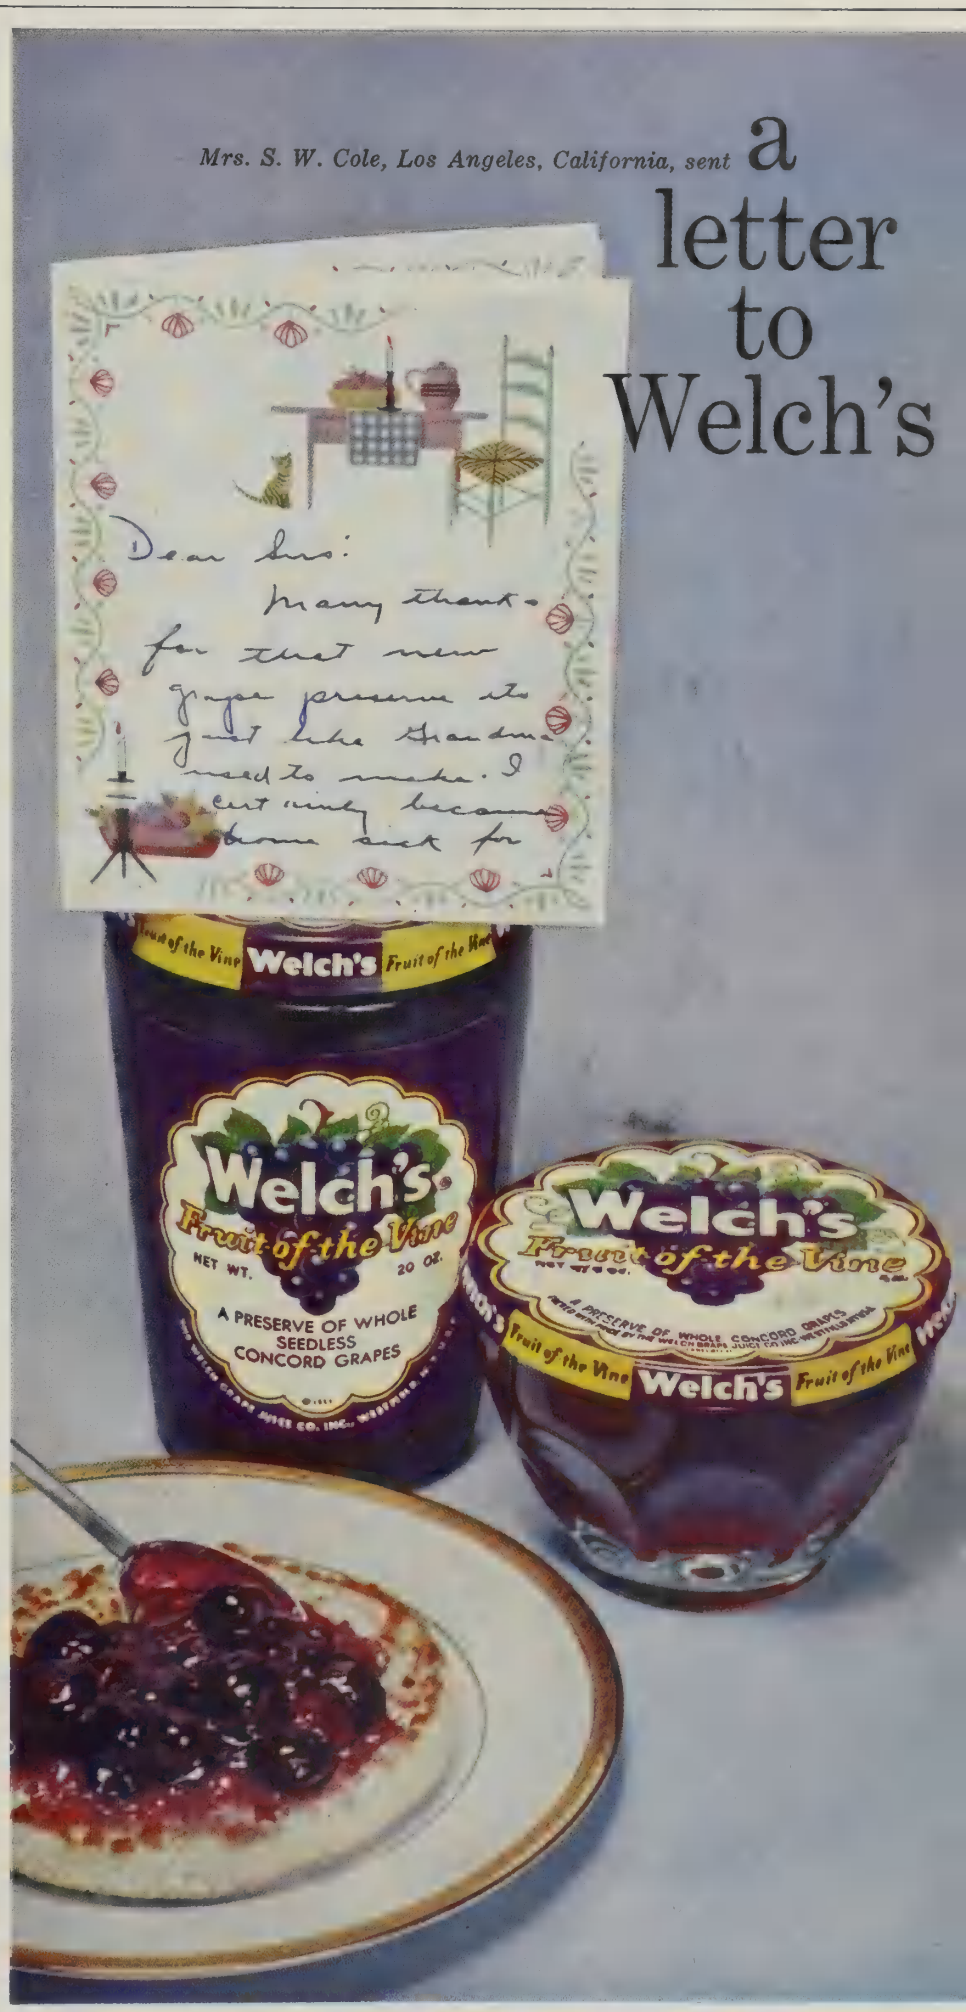
Dear Folks: Angela just called to tell me the engagement party is on for December twenty-seventh after all so I won't be coming home. Sorry I couldn't let you know sooner but I didn't know myself. You were a peach to write to Raoul. I know you'll like him. Tell Amanda her hair looks best the way she had it last summer.

Love,
DAVID

CHRISTMAS EVE



Christmas Eve is always a day of lists and frantic scurrying from one bit of last-minute unfinished business to another. Every Christmas I promise myself that next year I will get everything done beforehand and spend Christmas Eve serenely exuding Christmas spirit. I have a long-cherished picture of a completely decorated tree, completely wrapped presents and Gordon, me and the children grouped around the piano singing carols before supper on Christmas Eve, or even shortly afterward. Instead I usually find myself cross with the children, waspish with Gordon, who has never in eighteen years learned to string lights or put together mechanical toys, and hating myself for my crossness and waspishness and all the things I've left undone. The spirit of Christmas emerges only at odd and lonely moments when no one is around to benefit. I awoke this morning to the lists I'd made the night before staring at me from my dressing-table mirror.

Chestnuts for stuffing. Tree. Blue lights. Extension cord. Mother Blair's damask cloth. Return Gordon's pajamas to be exchanged for size. Speak to Bertha about shouting from the kitchen. Mail amethyst to Angela. Mother Blair's present? Make place cards. Call Mr. Dunstable about cough in furnace. Mend blue satin dress. Uptons at five. Choir practice twins six. Silver ribbon. Call Sally about supper dance at club if Raoul comes in time.

Raoul arrived a little before noon in a topless convertible with a French horn and a Dalmatian that apparently makes the front seat his permanent home.

He said he would have got here sooner had it not been for the rains of Virginia. Because of the topless convertible he and Triquot, he said, had to seek the shelter when it rained. He said he'd met a lot of so kind people that way. David had neglected to tell us that Raoul has dark waving hair, curling lashes, a devastating smile and Charles Boyer accent. I felt something dangerously close to a flutter as he

TENSE NERVOUS HEADACHES need ANACIN

Why 3 out of 4 Doctors Recommend the Famous Ingredients of ANACIN for Fast Fast Fast Pain Relief!

Tense, nervous headaches—so common today—need special pain relief. Here's why Anacin Tablets give you better total effect in relieving pain than aspirin or any buffered aspirin—why a survey shows 3 out of 4 doctors recommend the famous ingredients of Anacin® to relieve pain of headache, neuritis and neuralgia:

→ ACTS INSTANTLY: Anacin goes to work instantly. Brings fast relief right to the source of your pain.

→ MORE EFFECTIVE: Anacin is like a doctor's prescription. That is, Anacin contains not just one, but a combination of medically proven ingredients, each helping to increase the effectiveness of the others.

→ SAFER: These tablets have a smoother action and simply can not upset your stomach.

→ LESSENS TENSION: Anacin also contains a special ingredient (not found in aspirin or any buffered aspirin) which reduces nervous tension and anxiety—leaves you comfortably relaxed after your pain goes—thus giving you a better total effect in pain relief. Buy Anacin today.

Can not upset your stomach took my hand and Amanda—who only an hour before, observing me arranging our more erudite periodicals on the living-room table and concealing the pedestrian ones beneath it, had stated that I could put on all the airs I wanted to, but she for one was going to be herself, track man or no track man—fled upstairs at sight of him and shed her jeans in favor of a skirt and her one cashmere sweater.

Tuck and Johnny, looking dubious, shook hands stiffly and asked Raoul if he'd ever been on television. There was a spy, they said, on Foreign Intrigue that talked just like him. Raoul said he'd been on the television once, a students' forum, but that was all. Johnny wanted to know what was a fore-arm and Tuck told him it was a table that people sat around and asked each other important questions. Raoul said that whatever it was it had been very dull and that he'd much rather have been on Foreign Intrigue. Amanda, who wouldn't miss Invitation to Learning for anything, said that she, too, thought forums were dull but that she supposed they were necessary because so much of the world was so poorly informed. Raoul smiled and said that she looked just as David had said she would look. When Amanda asked tremulously "And how was that?" Raoul smiled again and said he liked A-mary-can girls because they were so direct.

Amanda hardly waited for the guest-room door to close behind him before saying that she didn't think she'd go to Patricia's for the carol singing tonight after all because after all Christmas Eve should be a family thing, didn't I think so? I said that I did and fervently wished I'd not arranged to have Raoul take Sally to the supper dance at the club and wondered how I could tell Amanda about it without being too pointed. I told her without being too pointed and she said stoically that after all she had promised Patricia and Patricia was counting on her alto and that just so a family was together Christmas Day maybe Christmas Eve didn't matter. She said where were her mittens as she thought she'd take a walk, a long walk because she needed some fresh air. Just as she went out the door she said she didn't see why everybody was being so considerate of Sally just because David had gone and got engaged. It wasn't, she said, as though Sally had been widowed. Besides, she said, Sally just wasn't Raoul's type in the least. She strode out slamming the door behind her.

Raoul emerged from the guest room wearing an old pair of Army pants and an old shirt of David's. I asked him if he'd like to go out to the farm with the twins and me to collect the tree and he said he would be most pleased. He put on his coat and the expressman arrived with the chemistry set for Tuck, the punching bag for Johnny, and the new parts for the electric train, which I locked in the Santa Claus closet under the stairs.

The telephone rang. Mother Blair wanted to know if Raoul had arrived and if I thought he would like to meet the Durbins because they had spent a year in Paris with UNRRA and she had such a charming way with strange young men. I said the last thing Raoul needed was someone who had a charming way with strange young men, as would be perfectly obvious to her (Mother Blair) the moment she laid eyes on him and that besides I didn't think the year in Paris had improved either of the Durbins.

Mother Blair said had I heard that the Hazeltons were back together again and what did I make of it? She said she thought it very undignified of them. She said she thought that once people had gone that far publicly toward a divorce they should make it stick. She said what was I giving Gordon for Christmas and did I think he would like one of his father's old guns?

Bernice Hazelton called and wanted to know if we were going to the Uptons' party. I said I wished people wouldn't give parties on Christmas Eve but that we would probably go because Maizie Upton entertained only once a year and was terribly sensitive about it and because Roger Upton had been such a help to Gordon on the lawsuit about the fertilizer. Bernice said she didn't know whether she and John would go or not because she didn't have anything to wear that didn't make her look you-know-what and she couldn't bear it if people guessed you-know-what because there was enough talk as it was but that if they did decide to go could they go with us as they needed ballast.

The phone rang again and Raoul took off his coat and sat down on the bottom step of the stairs and read Gordon's latest Farm Journal, which he must have retrieved from under the living-room table. It was Gordon's sister Dolly, who wanted to know if I'd heard about Bernice Hazelton. I said what about her and Dolly said she'd heard that the reason the Hazeltons had got back together was that Bernice didn't have long to live. I said "Pshaw" and Dolly said she'd heard that what Bernice had was a malignant growth and did I remember that Bernice's mother had died of cancer?

When I hung up and apologized to Raoul for all the delay he said delightedly that this was just like at home because his mother, he said, resided always on the telephone.

The telephone rang. Gordon wanted to know when I was coming for the tree. I said any day now and Raoul put on his coat.

We were late for lunch and Bertha, who always gets off right after lunch on Christmas Eve, shouted from the kitchen that the soufflé had fallen and that she was due at the First African Baptist Church at two o'clock and not one minute later. Amanda appeared wearing her hair the way she used to last summer, faint blue shadows around her eyes and her lips painted on so that they tilted upward at the corners in an alarming way, as though they might possibly fall off. She asked Raoul how he'd liked the farm and what he thought of America as a whole and did Triquot, the Dalmatian, actually live on the front seat of his car and if so what did he do when he wanted to take someone out—about Triquot, that is. Raoul said that only when it rained did Triquot leave the car and that when he wanted to take someone out if she was small Triquot could make room, if otherwise he took taxi. Amanda said gleefully that she doubted if Sally would be small enough. Raoul wanted to know who was Sally. Amanda told him and added that she was sure he would like Sally because she was so wholesome. The twins contributed to this somewhat distorted view by telling Raoul that Sally could beat anybody at tennis and last year had almost won the women's golf tournament. Raoul, looking understandably depressed, said this Sally sounded most interesting, whereupon Amanda hastened to seal Sally's doom by saying that even if he didn't find Sally exactly his type she hoped he would be nice to her because Sally needed to have someone be nice to her now that David had gone and got engaged to someone else.

After lunch I took to the living-room couch with ribbons, paper, the new book on flower arrangements for Mother Blair, the wallet with the Indian head painted on for Gordon from the twins and the new lamp for Gordon's desk which defies wrapping except in a box which I haven't got. Between wrappings I opened an ominously fat letter which had just come from Mrs. Cutler this morning and which I trusted would give a play-by-play breakdown of the change in plans. The ominously fat letter proved to be an engraved invitation to the announcement party. Folded into this was a breezy little note saying she wished that Gordon and I could be there for the occasion and that David was truly a fine boy and that she had written a little poem for Angela to commemorate the occasion, a copy of which she would send us if we so desired, though she never liked to thrust her little efforts on people. I closed my eyes and wondered if the little effort would be in free verse or sonnet form and wondered if it were true that sons when they married always gravitated toward the wife's family and away from their own and what David really thought about Mr. and Mrs. Cutler when he thought about them at all.

Amanda, trying not to look ecstatic, interrupted my wonderings to tell me that she and Raoul were going downtown to do some last-minute shopping. She added that they were going in the topless convertible. The twins, she said, had turned the hose on Triquot and he was now sitting under the kitchen table slobbering at Bertha and waiting for the rain to stop.

Gordon telephoned to ask if we'd picked up the tree and if David's protégé had arrived and if we really had to go to the Uptons' party as something had come up about the lettuce and he doubted if he'd get home before six. I reminded him that last year it had been the new foreman something had come up about; I reminded him about Roger and the fertilizer. I did not tell him the Hazeltons were coming with us and he allowed as how he might make it by five-thirty but not to count on it.

Sally telephoned to say the supper dance at the club would be at nine and to ask if Raoul had brought a Tuxedo because if he hadn't it would be all right as some of the boys weren't wearing them but she just wanted to know because if he hadn't brought one she would wear ballerina length instead. She said she'd got a note from David asking her to be nice to Raoul and telling her something about him but she'd torn the note up and couldn't remember what the something was and what did I think of him, Raoul? I said I thought he was very French and Sally snorted and said that was just what she'd been afraid of and didn't I think David had a nerve even if he probably did mean well? She said was it true Angela was announcing her engagement right after Christmas and did that mean they'd be getting married next summer? I said they wouldn't be getting married for years and Sally snorted again and said she wouldn't count on that as she'd never seen a girl so avidly after a man in her life.

I finished wrapping Gordon's lamp and Johnny came in looking mysterious and shut the living-room door behind him and asked in a whisper if I'd please help him wrap Tuck's present. Tuck's present turned out to be the two goldfish in a bowl which Johnny had been eying greedily through the dime-store window for months. I said I didn't see how we could wrap it and couldn't we just tie a red ribbon around it and put it under the tree, but Johnny said no, it would have to be wrapped. This took two enormous pieces of the most expensive paper because the most expensive paper was gold, Johnny's favorite color, and a whole roll of gold ribbon. Five minutes after Johnny's departure Tuck tiptoed in, closing the door behind him, and asked if I'd help him wrap Johnny's present, which turned out to be two goldfish in a bowl. I hugged Tuck even though he doesn't like to be hugged and we wrapped it in two sheets of gold paper because gold was Johnny's favorite color.

Amanda and Raoul returned from downtown looking mysterious and asking if they could have the living room and the paper and the ribbons to themselves for a little while.

As I mended the blue dress and showered before going to the Uptons', Amanda perched on my bed and asked me if I knew that Raoul's father had been Resistance and that his mother was a novelist who wrote about Napoleonic times because she thought women in Napoleonic times were so much more independent than women today because they took lovers and didn't care who knew it and nowadays they care. Amanda said that Raoul said that he was glad he hadn't been alive then because he despised independent women. Raoul, she said, thought that I was marvelous because I was happy in a woman's role and played it so graciously. I said crossly that was because I'd once aspired to be an actress and could play any role graciously. Amanda said did I know that Raoul was an English major and wasn't that a coincidence? I said "Why a coincidence?" and Amanda said because that was what she was going to major in too. Cruelly I asked her what about physics and she said that though physics "interested" her she hardly thought of physics as a woman's role; and speaking of a woman's role, did I realize I'd put on a little weight around the middle? Raoul, she said, thought I had a perfectly divine figure and she knew I'd want to keep it that way.

Gordon arrived at six and wanted to know why I wasn't dressed yet. It would take him only two minutes, he said, to shower and shave and here it was six o'clock and I wasn't even dressed. I said I was sure it would take him only two minutes to shower and shave but that I could be dressed, hair fixed, make-up on and nails done in the time it would take him to pick out a necktie. Gordon won't ever let me decide on his necktie and it's always a major decision involving past combinations, present contingencies and future possibilities. He said he didn't see why people had to give parties on Christmas Eve when people should be at home trimming their trees and singing Christmas carols with their children. He said was that long-legged Romeo sliding down the banisters with the twins David's protégé and if so would I please tell him who he—Gordon—was, and that even though he—Gordon—wore boots and a sheepskin jacket he was the man of the house and had not, as Raoul thought, come to fix the furnace. Would I also tell him, in case Mr. Dunstable did come to fix the furnace—though he, Gordon, was sure that he wouldn't and that the blasted thing would be dead of consumption before morning—that in America we address furnace fixers and farmers alike as Mr. and not as "My good fellow." He said would I please get him out a white shirt and he hoped Bertha had ironed the collar right for once.

In a few minutes he appeared looking scrubbed and handsome and serene. He said he was so glad I was wearing the blue dress as it had always been one of his favorites because it matched my eyes. He put on shirt, trousers, socks and shoes and sat down on the chaise longue and said that if this weather held we'd have a bumper crop of lettuce this year and that the new foreman was working out much better than he'd expected he would. I chose this moment to tell him that the Hazeltons were going to the party with us and he said that was fine as he wanted to talk over with John some investments he was thinking of making if lettuce did what he thought it was going to do. The doorbell rang and I left Gordon to pick out his tie while I went down to greet the Hazeltons.

Bernice in clinging black looked slim and svelte as ever. If anyone gave the show away it would be John. Always tending toward a certain smugness, he now seemed to burst at the seams with pomposity. Every time Bernice moved he was at her elbow pulling out chairs, arranging cushions, his eyes filled with a tender solicitation which would have been touching had it not been so incongruous.

Gordon finally appeared wearing a red-and-blue tie and slightly off-pink socks. He had his watch in his hand and he was scowling. John helped Bernice out of her chair and into her mink cape and out to the car, and Gordon asked me worriedly what was wrong with poor old Bernice. He'd heard, he said, that she had cancer, but he hadn't believed it until now. I said that Bernice did have a growth but that it was not malignant, it was benign. We got into the car, Gordon and Bernice in front, John and I in back, a seating arrangement that seems to be chronic with all couples who've been married over two years and one which I thoroughly abhor but have never had the courage to oppose. The next phase is even worse, husbands in front and wives in back, but should be easier to circumvent as no male vanity is involved.

The Uptons, comparative newcomers to Bromley, live in one of the oldest, least inhabitable houses in town and have spent thousands of dollars keeping it that way. It has even been said it took two plumbers and a graduate engineer to restore the roar to the chain-manipulated closets. Mr. Upton is a retired corporation lawyer and his wife is a retired perfectionist. Their once-a-year party is always huge, noisy and overstaffed. As we walked up the front steps and heard through the closed windows the familiar barnyard sound of women's voices raised to party pitch, Gordon said, "Forty-five minutes is all. I'll meet you in forty-five minutes. At the front door."

One hour and forty-five minutes later I was finally able to extricate him from an utterly absorbing conversation with Mrs. Upton's red-haired divorced niece. Gordon, looking immensely pleased with himself, said he was sorry he'd run a few minutes over our allotted time but that he'd had no idea Mrs. Upton's niece knew so much about modern art. Except for the purchase ten years ago of two Cézanne prints and a beat-up Monet that may or may not be an original, I'd no idea that Gordon was interested in modern art either. I counted to ten and said how nice and that we would have to have her over before she left, to which Gordon replied happily that she wasn't leaving but planned to open a small art shop in Bromley, though by all means we should have her over as she found Bromley, for the most part, pretty dull.

Got home to find Amanda, having for reasons best known to herself and possibly Raoul cut short her evening at Patricia's, struggling to make the tree fit the old tree stand. She was wearing her silver ballerina-length dress, flat silver sandals and my silver earrings, and every fifteen minutes she looked at the clock and every other fifteen minutes she repaired to the lavatory off the dining room where she put on more lipstick and powder. By eleven o'clock she looked made up for the Folies-Bergère. To Gordon's innocent query did she have a late date she delivered a heated dissertation on how important it was to look festive on festive occasions. At eleven-fifteen I suggested that the twins go to bed and received from them a heated dissertation on how Christmas came but once a year. At eleven-thirty Tuck went to sleep in Gordon's chair and at eleven-thirty-five Johnny collapsed under the big table. At midnight the tree was finished and Amanda said she thought we should sing carols. Gordon said he thought we should go to bed. Amanda, again looking at the clock, said the trouble with our family was that we didn't have any Christmas spirit. In France, she said, they sang Christmas in. In France, she said, no one thought of going to bed until Christmas morning. Gordon said that in France the only thing that divided any night from any day was the color of the wine you drank. The French, he said, hoisting a twin across his shoulder, were notorious for turning night into day and vice versa, which was just one of the reasons why he was glad he was not a Frenchman. Amanda looked as though she were about to cry and I quickly suggested a nightcap all around. Mercifully at quarter past midnight Raoul returned, but Amanda's joy was short-lived. Raoul, tossing his coat onto the nearest chair, dashed across the room to plant a kiss on my startled brow. "To thank you, to thank you," he cried joyously, "to thank you for leading me to Salleee. Such a girl, such a wonderful girl, so alive, so clever. I am already half in love."

My eyes flew to Amanda, my little painted Folies girl with her heart pinned to her sleeve, and I could almost feel my own heart constrict with a long-forgotten pain. The shine faded from her eyes but her mouth still smiled and she seemed to whirl on silver sandals as she turned to take the bottle of pop Gordon had brought her.

"Bravo," she said in a voice that I'd never heard before and dimly realized was to be Amanda's woman's voice, "then we shall drink to Sally's rapid recovery, shall we?" For a moment Raoul looked blank and then, tilting the glass Gordon gave him, he asked worriedly if Sally had been sick. Amanda, suddenly herself again, flushed and said not really and Raoul said, "Oh, you mean David." He smiled. "Poor Salleee"—he shook his head—"so in love, so very much in love and so heartbroke. It has made her eyes large and her mouth soft and she will learn, so much she will learn. From me," he added complacently and, holding his glass high, said, "I prefer to drink to a Joyeux Noel and to the so kind Blairs." We drank to a Joyeux Noel which I tried, in spite of Amanda's stricken look, and the fact that the furnace was making an entirely new and ominous noise, to visualize.

I've got the brooch on right now. It looks simply marvelous with everything but especially with what I've got on right now.

Love to the twins and Amanda. (How did she like Raoul? Isn't he marvelous?)

Thanking you again,

Your future daughter-in-law!

Dear Family: What a Christmas! You must have hocked the farm. Thanks, pop, for the check. It will come in mighty handy (already has). And mom, the Brahms album is super and as for the money for "courtin' clothes," as you put it, I've done all my "courtin' " for the next fifty years, I hope. Had no idea Angela had so many relatives, friends and miswhile father. Seems she knows somebody that knows somebody that knows his wife's sister.

Dear Mrs. Blair: Mr. Cutler and I both enjoyed having David with us for Christmas. He is a charming lad and was apparently successful with family and friends alike.

The engagement party was sweet, very simple, only eighty people and a string quartet. I do think the children enjoyed it. Enclosed is the little poem which you wanted me to send.

Mr. Cutler and I are preparing to get away by the fourth and should reach Bromley sometime the afternoon of the sixth but you mustn't try to have us at your house, you really mustn't. As you say, the inn is nearby and will allow us ample time for visiting.

Sincerely yours,

DENISE CUTLER

Crowell-Collier accepted our offer and is making other arrangements for Canadian subscribers.

McCall's made a similar offer, which was accepted. Therefore, if your Woman's Home Companion subscription was to expire after the January 1957 issue, one of the following things will happen:

- If you were a Companion subscriber as well as a Journal subscriber, your Journal subscription will be extended by the number of copies of Companion still due.
- If you are a subscriber to McCall's Magazine but not to the Journal, your McCall's subscription will be extended by the number of copies of Companion still due.
- Companion subscribers in California, Indiana, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania and Texas who are subscribers to both Journal and McCall's will receive McCall's. All others, except Canadian, will receive the Journal.
- If you are not in any of the above groups, arrangements are presently being worked out to fulfill the unexpired portion of your Companion subscription.

The work of cross-checking nearly 10,000,000 names and correcting stencils and other records is obviously enormous! A number of months will be required to complete this work. Meanwhile, may we ask your co-operation? To speed the task, please do not write either to us or to McCall's about your Companion subscription. Further announcements will be made from time to time. Thank you for your co-operation.

Dear Mr. and Mrs. Blair: The brooch is perfectly beautiful and I practically cried when I opened the box and saw it. Our party was simply marvelous and it is a shame you couldn't have been here. Everybody thought David was marvelous just the way I knew they would and I think even David had a good time.

David and I haven't said anything to mumsy or father about this so it's still strictly graveyard but we both think it's awfully silly now that we are really engaged to wait a whole year and a half to get married. I mean we don't want to impose on our parents even if we could which David says we absolutely can't but I'm sure there must be a way especially if I leave Miss English's and go to secretarial school or something like that. Just wanted you to know in case David mentions something about it when he's home at New Year's so you would know I'm all for it. I think long engagements are a ghastly strain on everybody, don't you?

Much love,

DAVID

P.S. Mrs. Cutler says to tell you that the Albert Goings who wrote the play is my erstcellaneous people that "we have to be nice to." There've been parties every night. I shall use your money to buy a nice little padded cell, or if worst comes to worst a shroud. All kidding aside, it will come in mighty handy, mom. And I will spend it on clothes. I promise you.

Thanks, Johnny, for the socks and thank you, Tuck, for the notebook. How did you know I was fresh out of socks and notebooks?

Amanda, you were an angel to think of a frame for Angela's picture. I've already got it (her picture) in it. It's one I took myself with tricky lighting effects and makes her look like a real seductress which is just exactly what she is, bless her. Anyhow, thanks.

Must stop now and shave for Aunt Abigail's little shindig this afternoon. Aunt Abigail is ninety-three and reminds me of Mr. Dunstable in a funny sort of way. Maybe it's just because they've both of them never married and seem pleased as Punch about it.

See you New Year's.

NEW YEAR'S EVE

Ever since Christmas Eve everybody has had something the matter with them. Amanda is in love with Raoul, a state which has produced hives, two headaches and the disposition of a prima donna on opening night. Gordon lost twenty acres of lettuce, a state which has produced a very bad cold and the disposition of a wounded tiger. The twins have had some sort of mysterious stomach upset which Doctor Flanders has diagnosed as flu but which I suspected, until today, had to do with the disappearance of two boxes of candied orange peel and half a fruitcake. But today Raoul, who was supposed to have left yesterday and didn't because Salleee had not yet promised to come to the Princeton prom in the spring, came down with a "mysterious" stomach upset.

David arrived at five A.M. having as usual taken an "earlier" plane. He and Raoul held a reunion in the kitchen over fried eggs, coffee and fruitcake that roused the entire household. After that David held a reunion over the telephone with Angela. It seems they'd been separated twenty-one and a half hours and that neither of them had ever experienced such concentrated anguish before.

His anguish somewhat assuaged by ten minutes huddled over the little black instrument of communion, mouthing some incomprehensible gibberish in so low a pitch it was hard to believe that Angela, one thousand miles away, could understand him when we, in the next room, could not, he returned to the kitchen to ask what was on for New Year's Eve. This set off a depth charge that until that moment I'd managed to keep under control by the simple expedient of pretending not to hear anything at all. In the clamor that followed the twins made it clear that they were staying up until midnight, at which time they were going to shoot off firecrackers from Raoul's topless convertible which he would, they hoped, be driving down the main street of the town. Amanda, in a new Christmas negligee from Mother Blair which she wouldn't have been caught dead in two months ago, made it clear that they would be doing no such thing as Raoul was ill and at midnight should be propped in front of a warm fire with a hot toddy. However, she failed to make clear just whose fire, and Raoul, looking pleased and grateful, agreed that that was exactly what he intended to do if he could persuade Sally to leave the party they were going to early enough. David, looking astonished, said, "Sally? You're going somewhere with Sally?" Amanda, looking as though she, too, were coming down with the mysterious stomach ailment, said, "Why of course, naturally. Raoul is mad about her." David, still astonished, said about who and Raoul, beaming, said about Salleee of course and how David could not have guessed he could not guess and how David could ever have broken her heart he could not guess though he must admit Angela was a very beautiful woman, a woman with soul as well, but still . . . he shrugged and Amanda swept out of the room trailing yards of blue silk behind her which caught in the kitchen door as she slammed it. David said what was the matter with Amanda and as I gave him an I'll-tell-you-later look from behind Raoul's back Johnny explained that she'd been that way ever since he'd broken her eyelash curlers. Raoul said Amanda was a grand girl and just to prove it he would get her another eyelash curler if Johnny would tell him what they looked like and where they could be purchased. I, who had been wondering at the look of chronically startled fawn, said rather crossly that if he really wanted to do something for Amanda he could tell her that her eyelashes were beautiful just as they were and went off in search of my woman child with the straight eyelashes and the battered heart hating all men for their cheerful lack of awareness.

In the upstairs hall I encountered Gordon angrily pacing outside Amanda's closed door. In an accusing whisper he said, "She's in there crying her eyes out," and propelled me into our room and shut the door and in a voice more in keeping with his frame of mind bellowed that that Frenchman would have to go. Everything, he said, and everybody had been off base since he got here and as for that dog of his, well any fool animal that spent his life in a fool car without even a roof on it . . . and as for that Charles Boyer accent, well, he never had liked Charles Boyer. . . . I sat down and mustered on my "quiet listener's" look and Gordon said, "I know he's a nice boy and all that, means well probably, but why is he still here? I thought he was supposed to leave two days ago." I explained about the mysterious stomach upset and Gordon said he didn't look very sick to him, not nearly as sick as he—Gordon—felt, and when was he going, tomorrow? Next week? "If I just had something to look forward to," he said, "a peaceful happy home again. Even you," he added dolefully, "have changed." Twice before Gordon has told me that I've changed: once when the twins and David all had the mumps at once and Bertha chose that time to get married and go on an extended honeymoon, and again the time when his sister's first husband died and at his suggestion she came with her three children for a month to recuperate. The first time it happened I wept, from sheer exhaustion; the second time I blew up, from sheer exhaustion. I now counted to seventeen and said, "Darling, let's not go to the club tonight. Let's just you and me stay home and see the New Year in alone together, shall we?" For a moment he looked like one of the twins when a carefully lighted firecracker has failed to go off, but suddenly he grinned and pulled me to my feet. "Poor darling," he said, "so many noses to wipe!"

When I finally got to Amanda I found her still swathed in blue silk seated at her desk copying something out of a small volume of Edna St. Vincent Millay into a pink-velvet-covered notebook and I wished I knew whether it was from the gallant I burn my candle at both ends era or one of the later and more maturely philosophic ones. Without this cue I was rather at a loss as to whether to proffer the comfort I'd come armed with or something less forthright. I said, "Darling, it's almost lunchtime, don't you think you'd better think about getting dressed?" Amanda, still scribbling fiercely, said she didn't want any lunch. Her long narrow back hunched over the desk had a broken look which the frail slender line of the neck and jaw above it did little to alleviate. I ventured a hand on one of the bent shoulders but it was sloughed off, as though it were some foreign object too heavy to be borne. She said that I really mustn't worry about her not eating because she'd stored up enough food what with Christmas and everything to last her a year. She said if she saw one more piece of turkey or fruitcake she'd scream and that was why, she said, she'd decided not to go to the Morgans' New Year's open house with Patricia's cousin from Alabama. I, who had known about neither party nor cousin until this moment and had been anxiously hoping that David would come up with some solution to Amanda and the New Year, sat down and said that after all she didn't have to eat anything even if she did go to the open house.

At that she closed the pink velvet notebook, gave me a withering look, and said that I knew very well that it wasn't really a question of the food, not really a question of Patricia's cousin who was a terrible bore and not good at anything except getting girls in dark corners and mauling them. I knew perfectly well, she said, just why she'd turned down the invitation and just what a fool she'd been to do it, but she didn't want to talk about it, couldn't possibly talk about it, and now would I please go and leave her alone.

The last was said so despairingly that I was not surprised when she stopped me at the door with an anguished, "What has Sally got that I haven't got?" I sat down again and pretended to think the question over when what I was really thinking over was could I possibly tell Amanda that being in love could still be an exciting and wonderful experience whether you got loved back or not and Amanda said, "It's so degrading! Being mad about somebody that doesn't even know you're a girl much less practically a woman. Couldn't I just go away somewhere until he leaves?" I said would that really help and she burst into tears and said that of course it wouldn't, that the truth of the matter was that she couldn't bear to think of his leaving, much less of leaving herself, but what was she to do because she couldn't stand it any longer, she simply couldn't. I said Raoul was really quite a person, wasn't he? Amanda nodded bleakly. I said he was certainly one of the most delightful, charming boys I'd ever met. Amanda nodded bleakly, and I said in a way she was lucky Amanda scowled and said "Lucky?" and I said lucky to have met him, to know him, to be in love with someone so special. Amanda dabbed at her eyes and I said, "Loving isn't all being loved, not by any manner of means." I said, "Look at Emily Dickinson." Amanda said she'd rather look at Elizabeth Barrett Browning. "Besides," she said, "who wants to write poetry instead of being loved? I'd give up every career I've ever thought of having if Raoul would just look at me once the way he looks at Sally," she said, and picked up the pink velvet notebook and hurled it across the room. Her back no longer looked broken and there was color in her cheeks and I wished Raoul could see her now because whatever else he might not realize he would realize that she was, as she'd said, practically a woman.

Someone did knock, but it wasn't Raoul. It was David. He wanted to know if it was all right if he and Raoul took the twins out to the farm to shoot off their firecrackers now so they wouldn't hold out for midnight and Raoul's topless convertible and would Amanda like to come along. Amanda said that she would, and unexpectedly here was the empty house I'd been longing for ever since Christmas, the hour or two alone in which to gather myself together before the New Year caught up with me. Determined to use this little oasis for spiritual advancement, I sat down at my desk and at the top of a clean sheet of paper wrote "New Year's Resolutions," but pausing to choose between "contribute more to the community" and "better organization at home," my eye lit on the list of things to be done today which I'd made that very morning and promptly forgotten: "Get Gordon's tux from cleaners." . . . "Button on Johnny's jacket." . . . "Call Mother Blair about Sunday dinner." . . . "Do something about Amanda and the New Year." . . . "Ask David what the Cutlers are really like and if when they come I should put them in guest room with double bed or in David's room with singles."

The telephone rang. It was Bernice Hazelton. She wanted to know if when I was pregnant I'd ever had shooting pains in my back. I said probably though I couldn't really remember and why didn't she ask her doctor. She said because he'd never been pregnant, that was why, and wouldn't I please try to remember because it might not mean anything but then again it might and if it did she'd be awfully upset because she was beginning to get attached to the little monster. I said she should call her doctor whether I'd had shooting pains or not because everybody was different and that, as she said, though it probably didn't mean anything, it was best to know. She said I sounded just like her Great-aunt Trudy and hung up and I called Mother Blair. Before I could ask her for Sunday dinner she asked what Gordon and I had planned for New Year's Eve and before I could tell her about our quiet evening alone she said if we hadn't planned anything and were going to be at home she'd like to come over and see the New Year in with us because if she didn't she'd have to have the Wilkens sisters and the widow Jennings in as usual because they'd expect it and while she had nothing against them, was in fact very fond of them, she did feel she was getting in a rut on this New Year's Eve business. I said we weren't doing a thing and would be delighted to have her. She said in that case would we mind very much if she brought her new neighbors, the Corleys, with her as they didn't know many people yet and were lonely For a moment I contemplated making "Honesty at all costs" one of my

New Year's resolutions, but the New Year had not yet begun so I said we'd love to have the Corleys. She said she was sure we would like them because they were so young and spirited. Feeling suddenly old and dispirited, I said we'd look for them around nine.

Then Sally called to ask tonelessly if she could speak to Raoul, please. When I said that he had gone out to the farm with David she was silent for a moment and then she said, "You mean your David? I thought he was up north getting himself engaged." Before I could answer she said, "That spoils everything. Absolutely everything," and hung up.

I was inspecting the midnight-snack department when David called to say they'd be home shortly and I wasn't to worry about a thing, that they were at Doctor Bailey's office and Doctor Bailey had already said that it was just a surface burn and Tuck was being a brave little soldier and I wasn't to worry about a thing.

I said I'd be right over and David said that wasn't necessary, that he'd let me speak to Tuck instead. Tuck said tremulously that the doctor was going to give him a shot and that if he didn't cry could he stay up until New Year's. I said that he could indeed and he said "Johnny too?" and I said yes.

I'd just about decided that we had almost enough food to see us through Mother Blair and the Corleys when the telephone rang again and it was Sally again saying that actually the party she and Raoul were going to was going to be deadly and that while she could get David an invitation it was going to be deadly and besides he might not feel loyal to Angela going out on New Year's Eve and as long as Raoul hadn't been well and probably shouldn't go out would I mind very much if she just came over here and we all had a quiet New Year's Eve together. I said I wouldn't mind very much but if it was a quiet New Year's Eve she wanted there were about a dozen other places I could suggest, the country club among them. Sally giggled appreciatively at what she considered my little joke and said to tell Raoul to pick her up about nine.

When Amanda heard of this latest development she said she couldn't possibly sit around all night and watch Sally making eyes at Raoul, not possibly, she'd die first and what was she to do? There was only one thing she could do and I did it. I called Patricia and asked her to bring her date and her cousin from Alabama over after the Morgans' open house.

The only nice thing that happened was a telephone call from Gordon at five to say apologetically that two produce men from New York had just dropped in on their way to Florida and that the only way he would be able to get rid of them was to take them out and buy them a dinner. He said this was going to make him pretty late but otherwise he'd have to bring them home with him and then they'd be here all night. He said he hated to let me down when we'd planned a quiet evening together and that maybe I'd better go ahead and ask a few people in. I said maybe I'd better and he said I did understand, didn't I, and when I assured him that I did he said I was wonderful and that next New Year's Eve he'd make it up to me.

And so in the end Gordon's and my quiet New Year's Eve alone together boiled down to a few stolen minutes alone together in the kitchen under the mistletoe Bertha had hung from the kitchen light which we turned off.

January 3

The boys got off today, David by bus and Raoul and Triquot by topless convertible. Everybody kissed everybody good-by and Amanda has been going around holding one hand to her cheek ever since, with the other she occasionally dabs at her eyes. Gordon, on the other hand, has taken on new life.

Only now as I crawl gratefully into bed at nine-thirty do I realize that I forgot to ask David about how to sleep the Cutlers and that he forgot to talk to me about what Angela said he was going to talk to me about. And also realize with a feeling bordering on panic that the reason why none of these things got talked about was that David and I didn't have five minutes alone the entire time he was here. And only yesterday, it seems, we would while away an entire afternoon under the sycamore tree, my little boy and I, and have no idea we were spending anything of value.

My dear, so kind Mrs. Blair: Never has a Frenchman's heart been so full of gratitude for the "American way of life" of which you gave me so generously. I am very fortunate that whenever I shall think of an American family I shall think of you and your husband and your handsome children.

Triquot and I returned with little difficulties excepting Delaware where it rained and we passed the night with a farmer and wife whom we met in a barn waiting for the sun to shine. But the farm was not like that of Mr. Blair, the farmer also, and his wife the kind had not your charms or figure.

Tell the twins as you say "Hay" and tell Amanda I love her like she was my own sister.

Dear Mrs. Blair: Mr. Cutler and I have been somewhat delayed by unexpected business at his office, but we will surely get off by tomorrow and if all goes well plan to reach Bromley in the late afternoon of the eighth. I shall be delighted to accept your generous invitation for the night, but Mr. Cutler will stay at the inn, as we are accustomed to separate rooms.

We are looking forward to meeting Angela's future in-laws and only hope this delay in our plans has not inconvenienced you.

Dear Mrs. Blair: Have just received an ecstatic letter from my son Raoul written from your home in South Carolina where he seems to have spent the holidays. How very kind of you. I do hope he behaved. He can be a darling, and is, but impetuous. He writes that he is in love. I cannot help being a little curious as this is the first time, to my knowledge, that he has been able to close his eyes to all women in the favor of one. He neglected to tell if the recipient of his heart was your daughter Amanda or one named Sallee.

As a small token of gratitude for your kindness toward Raoul I am sending a painting of a scene in your South Carolina by a young Parisian who I think will someday be worth something. I spent a whole day in shops trying to find something French but at same time interesting and amusing and finally came home and found this out of my own attic where I'd put it after falling out of love with the artist who painted it. He spent a winter in your state tutoring on one of the plantations—and did some of his best work there. I do hope you like it. I can sometimes be wrong.

Do you ever come to Paris?

Dear David's Mother: It is wonderful to think of you and Mr. Blair meeting mumsy and dad and I know that you are going to like each other once you get to know each other.

David says he didn't talk to you about my plan to leave Miss English's and take a secretarial course so we can be married in June because while he wants to get married just as badly as I do, even worse at times, he's so afraid that even if I got a job something might happen and then we'd have to ask my parents for help. I've already promised him I won't have a baby or anything like that but you know how men are. However, I do think he's beginning to come around a little bit but the point is I haven't said anything about any of this yet to mumsy and dad because I thought I'd wait until they got back from Florida all rested and relaxed et cetera.

So I guess mum is the word.

Love to everybody,

THE CUTLERS

January 8

Awoke feeling harassed but didn't remember why until Gordon, who had sneaked into my bed sometime during the night, yawned and stretched and said, "What do you talk to stockbrokers about? Stocks?" I said did he think we should have roast beef for dinner and be safe or should he break out the pheasant Dolly's widower had brought us after his last hunt? Gordon said he supposed if worst came to worst he could talk about the New York Central Railroad. He said he'd noticed that anyone living up the Hudson took personal pride in the New York Central. I said did I just imagine it or did the house seem abnormally cold and just then Johnny stuck his nose in the door and howled that the furnace was off.

Mr. Dunstable said sleepily that he'd be over after he'd had his breakfast. I explained about David's future in-laws and said I'd personally cook him breakfast. He said he always had liked my coffee but how about my eggs? Couldn't ever be sure about a woman's eggs, he said, and added did I mind very much David's getting himself hooked up with a Yankee girl? Yankee girls, he said, were mighty brainy which, he felt, left much to be desired in a woman. I said crisply that we were all very pleased about the match but that if Mr. and Mrs. Cutler arrived to find the furnace out of order it might change the whole picture. I added that I'd never had any complaints on my eggs, fried or scrambled, and that I'd expect him within the hour.

I leaped into a pair of Amanda's old jeans and one of Gordon's flannel shirts and shivered my way down to the kitchen where I found Amanda sitting at the kitchen table in her old brown bathrobe drinking coffee and reading Christina Rossetti. Now that Raoul was gone and I no longer was paralyzed with tenderness every time I looked at her, I could speak my mind and did. I reminded her that she was due at school in one hour and ten minutes, that the Cutlers were coming and she hadn't yet given her room the promised cleaning and that much as I needed her help in getting breakfast for five people in a cold unheated house, I'd still prefer she do something about her room before she went to school.

Very slowly she stood up, clutching the bathrobe around her in an injured way, and fixed me with large, somber, tearful eyes. "I'd give anything, absolutely anything," she said, "to be in your shoes and yet all you do is complain." Thinking of the Cutlers, the broken-down furnace and Mr. Dunstable's eggs, I couldn't imagine what on earth she was talking about and said so. Gently she picked up Christina Rossetti and tucked it under her arm; pityingly she looked at me. "You," she said, "are cooking breakfast for the man you love."

"I'm cooking breakfast for Mr. Dunstable," I said cruelly, and at that point Gordon appeared in high boots, sheepskin jacket and his cap with the ear protectors on it and said in that case he thought he'd pick up breakfast at the Royal Café on his way to the farm. An escape which he'd obviously had in mind ever since he got out of bed this morning. I said as long as he was being so blasted noble would he be a little nobler and take the twins with him and drop them off at school.

Mr. Dunstable arrived at the back door just as Amanda, having picked up her room, showered, dressed and put away two helpings of cereal, three pieces of toast and four of bacon, departed out the front.

He didn't go near the furnace until he had cheerfully partaken of three fried eggs, four rashers of bacon, six pieces of toast, four cups of coffee, over the last of which he held forth on the marvels of electricity, the utter helplessness of a city without electric power, the tragedy of a civilization so utterly dependent on a man-made commodity. My eye on the clock, I nervously agreed. Finally, wiping his mouth with a large handkerchief which he pulled from his pocket in preference to the napkin I'd given him, he pronounced my eggs the best yet—at least female cooked, that is—and said, "And now let's have a look at the furnace." While he was gone the telephone rang. It was Western Union. A telegram from David which the telegraph operator had to read to me three times before I would believe it.

"A and I busted. Kaputt. Engagement off. Letter following." For one wild and dazed moment I thought this also meant we would be spared the Cutlers, until I remembered the Cutlers were at this point only a matter of hours away from Bromley and undoubtedly knew nothing about anything.

Mr. Dunstable returned from the basement to tell me gaily that there was nothing wrong with the furnace except that someone had turned the thermostat down to fifty-five and had forgotten to turn it up again. Knowing full well who that someone was, I blushed and Mr. Dunstable, looking the other way, said chivalrously that boys would be boys and I must expect this sort of thing with twins in the house. I unchivalrously said nothing and he thanked me again for breakfast and departed.

I couldn't reach Gordon at the farm so I called Mother Blair instead and read her David's telegram. She said what does "kaputt" mean and when I explained she said that was too bad because she'd rather liked Angela but if they had made a mistake it was better to have discovered it soon than late. I said I felt sick about it and could only hope it wasn't David's fault. I said and what on earth was I to do about the Cutlers? I said it had been hard enough knowing how to entertain them when we had David and Angela in common, but now we had nothing and here they were about to descend on us, a perfectly strange couple who didn't even share the same bedroom. Mother Blair said that was the first colorful thing she'd heard about them and did I suppose it was because he had someone else or she did or both and speaking of which had I heard that Bernice Hazelton didn't have cancer after all, that she was pregnant and didn't I think that was splendid? I said I did indeed but that she wasn't helping me with my problem a bit and hung up.

Gordon didn't come home for lunch—I'd somehow known he wouldn't—but he did have the grace to call and ask if the furnace was fixed. Without going into details I told him it was. I also told him about David's telegram. He said Angela was a heartless, fickle little wench and who did she think she was? I said maybe it was David who was heartless and fickle and Gordon said David might be young and all that but he was as steady and reliable as they come and that what Angela needed was a good spanking. I said that might well be, but what were we to do about the Cutlers? I could tell from the sudden silence at the other end of the line that Gordon, like me, had assumed that now there would be no Cutlers. I said that after all they'd been on the road for days and undoubtedly knew nothing about this, and that was undoubtedly why David had wired instead of writing.

Gordon said, "Did he wire collect?" And when I said he didn't, Gordon said in that case he guessed it was the real thing and frankly he didn't know what to do about the Cutlers unless we just ignored the whole thing until after they'd gone. A solution which to me, at the moment, seemed inspired.

The Cutlers arrived at about five. I was helping the twins with homework with one eye cocked toward the driveway looking for something long and black and hearselike and was entirely unprepared for the jaunty blue station wagon that bounced up to the front door with a confident air and came to a stop just short of my pet camellia bush.

Though I'd rehearsed Bertha that very morning on the fine points of greeting people at the door, I heard, as I descended the stairs, her usual ringing "Come right in. I'll call the missus," which she did in full voice.

From Denise Cutler's letters I'd formed a very definite picture of her, pale and prim and possibly given to vapors. I certainly was not prepared for a woman younger than I and extraordinarily lovely to look at in a patrician and well-bred way. Mr. Cutler, having remained faceless and formless until this moment, was less of a surprise, especially as I felt I'd seen him before here and there, in Pullman diners, in men's clubs, in the receiving line at debutante dances—well preserved, courteous, withdrawn, exuding the well-being not so much of the man who has arrived as that of the one who has always been there.

Mrs. Cutler said she did hope they weren't too early but they'd made so much better time than they'd expected. Mr. Cutler commended me for our state's excellent highways. Bertha, looking doggedly determined to do the right thing, took their coats and I led them into the west living room. Mrs. Cutler, looking around in a maddeningly detached way, said she'd had no idea from Angela's vague description that we had so spacious a house. I thought it clever of her to have so quickly found the only adjective in the entire English language which overlooked the faded slip covers, the battered furniture, the unpolished floors. Though I had rather hoped she'd notice Grandfather Blair's portrait or the eighteenth-century spinet or even Gordon's rather impressive collection of first editions relating to the War Between the States. Mr. Cutler agreed that it was indeed spacious, adding that he always had liked rooms that looked lived in, which rather startled me, as I'd spent a large part of the morning removing all signs of "lived in" and had kept everyone out of the room ever since. I said perhaps Mrs. Cutler would like to see her room, but she said that though she undoubtedly needed to freshen up she was just too exhausted right now to move. I said motoring could be very tiring. Mr. Cutler said, perhaps so, but that he thought it the only real way to see a country. Mrs. Cutler said they always hired a car abroad as it was the only real way to see a country. Didn't I agree? I said rather defensively that I'd never been abroad. The conversation, already undernourished, died and we tried to revive it with a heated discussion of Northern and Southern climates, a subject on which we were in complete agreement.

Gordon arrived on the dot of six, unshaven, still in farm boots, and radiating good cheer. Mr. Cutler seemed somewhat overwhelmed, but not Mrs. Cutler. She seemed all at once to emerge like a butterfly from its cocoon. Though she didn't literally spread her wings and fly to meet Gordon, one had the feeling that that was what was happening: her eyes lit up, color came and went in her cheeks and even her voice took on a lilt which had been entirely lacking before. She said she was enchanted to meet David's father, she said we'd all been sitting here champing at the bit waiting for the man of the house to start the festivities. Her poetry-reading voice, I decided. I also decided that it couldn't be Mrs. Cutler who was the separate-room addict and somehow felt just a little tiny bit closer to her.

I stole a few moments alone with Gordon in the pantry. I was dying to ask him what he thought of the Cutlers, but have long since learned this only makes him evasive and that it's better to let him ask me first, if I want the truth, so I said instead did he think they had any inkling that the engagement was off and he said if they did they were certainly mighty cheerful about it. I said they'd been cheerful only since he'd got there and Gordon said they were younger than he'd expected and what did I think of them? I said that as long as David wasn't going to be their son-in-law I didn't have to try to like them, which somehow made things easier and what did he think? Gordon said he thought they were two of the unhappiest people he'd run into in a long time, but in spite of that, or maybe because of it, he found them, and especially her, rather appealing.

I said what did he think had happened between Angela and David and he said angrily he thought it was a clear-cut case of a girl's just not knowing her own mind. I said maybe we should tell the Cutlers, because David had obviously expected us to and it might break the ice. Gordon said he didn't think we should tell them anything until we knew whose fault it was. He said that though he was sure it was Angela's fault we couldn't prove it yet, and if it should be David's fault it would make things even icier.

When we got back to the living room the twins and Amanda had taken over and the whole climate had miraculously changed. Mrs. Cutler was telling Amanda that she'd heard she was interested in poetry which, she said, made them related already as poetry was the very breath of life to her, and who were Amanda's favorite poets? On the other side of the room the twins were telling Mr. Cutler that if he was Angela's father he must have five cars and one of them a Jaguar because

McCORMICK . . . THE HOUSE OF FLAVOR

David had said so and could they sometime after David and Angela were married come and visit him and ride in it? Mr. Cutler was smiling, which suddenly made him look less like the man in the library of the men's club and more like Angela's father. After forty-five minutes of the twins' undivided attentions he confided to me as we went in to dinner that he had always wanted a son and that was one reason he was so pleased about Angela's engagement. He and David, he said, hadn't had much chance to make friends yet but he looked forward to the time when they would because he thought David was a fine boy and just the sort of son a man would want and did I think he might be interested in the brokerage business? Behind us Amanda and Mrs. Cutler were deep in Christina Rossetti. Bertha's husband had been on one of his sprees and Bertha, being in one of her despondent moods, had done marvels with the pheasant, also with the avocado mold which I hadn't been at all sure of. In fact, everything was going so unbelievably well I forgot all about David's telegram until Mr. Cutler stood up and proffered a toast to "our absent children who we hope will bring each other much happiness." At the other end of the table Gordon gave me a look that said the time had come and cleared his throat and just then the telephone rang. It was long distance from Princeton for Mrs. Cutler. Gordon gave me a look that said Here it is and cleared his throat again and asked Mr. Cutler if he would have some more pheasant. I tried not to look as though I was waiting for anything to happen. Mrs. Cutler, who had after the first course become Denise, was gone long enough to have broken two engagements and heard both sides of each. When she returned I gave her a look which I tried to make detachedly interested but which was in point of fact searching. She smiled, rather tremulously, I thought, around the table and said she was sorry to have been gone so long but that had been Angela and Angela treated all telephone calls alike, whether she was chatting with her next-door neighbor or someone in Timbuktu. Angela, she said, had sent all of us her love. Again she smiled round the table and forthwith applied herself with a kind of forthright intensity to the remainder of her dinner. On the way into the living room for coffee she detained Mr. Cutler for a few moments in the hall and Gordon, following me in with the coffee tray, muttered that he'd give his eyeteeth to know what they were saying and I said they were probably wondering how to break the news to us and Gordon said they would undoubtedly wait until the children went to bed. I said that was just as well, as maybe by then we could tell by their attitude toward us whether it had been Angela's or David's fault—whereupon Amanda came in and asked us what everyone was whispering about. The Cutlers in the hall and us in here. She said it gave her the creeps and wasn't very polite besides. I said didn't she have any studying to do, but I didn't make an issue of it because I saw it wasn't time yet for the twins to go to bed and there was no ruse under the sun that would get rid of them until then.

Happiness is a perishable fruit, which must be used each day, for it will not keep.

E. L. BENEDICT

I waded through three cups of coffee while Gordon and Mr. Cutler and the twins waded through a game of Monopoly and while Amanda explained to Mrs. Cutler, now Denise, why she preferred Edith Sitwell to Amy Lowell. Finally it was the twins' bedtime and Amanda remembered that she did have some homework after all and Gordon and I found ourselves sitting stiffly on the edge of our chairs waiting for the Cutlers to fire the opening shot. Mr. Cutler settled back in his armchair and asked if I'd mind too much if he smoked a cigar. He said he always liked a cigar, just one, after dinner. Mrs. Cutler settled back on the sofa and began talking quite calmly about what an enchanting girl Amanda was. It was so seldom, she said, that you found true sensitivity in young people today. She hesitated and Gordon and I leaned forward expectantly and she said she did hope we'd let Amanda visit them someday. Mr. Cutler mused that he would certainly like to take those boys to the circus. Mrs. Cutler asked testily why and he said because he'd always wanted to take a boy to a circus and never had. Gordon got up abruptly to remove the coffee cups and I, under pretext of checking on the twins, followed him out to the pantry. I said that this was ridiculous, that we should tell them that we knew and let them off the hook. Gordon said why spoil an evening that had turned out so much better than anyone had expected, and besides, how could I be sure that the Cutlers actually did know? I said because of the call from Angela. Gordon said how did I know what Angela had told her mother? He said maybe Angela was just as anxious as we were to keep everything under control until we weren't all breathing down each other's necks. I said I wished David had felt the same way. I added that I thought the Cutlers were behaving commendably and Gordon said he wished they'd stop acting so commendably and go to bed.

Mr. Cutler eventually did, escorted to the inn by Gordon, but Denise, to my horror, suggested "a little chat" before turning in, "just the two of us." I inwardly debated whether I should admit to any foreknowledge of what I was sure our "little chat" would be concerned with. But as it turned out our little chat was not in the slightest concerned with David and Angela but with the subject of separate rooms and how awkward it was to explain when they went visiting. I said she shouldn't feel that she had to explain, that lots of people preferred separate rooms, that it was actually no one's business but their own and no one thought a thing about it. Having delivered myself of this monstrous lie, I sat back and eagerly waited for her to continue, which she did with startling alacrity. It wasn't, she said, the way it seemed at all. She and Reggie, she said, really got on remarkably well, considering. She paused and I waited breathlessly for the revelation and just then Gordon returned and Denise, flushing prettily, said she hoped they'd not kept us up too late because she knew that men who worked with the soil had to be up at dawn. Gordon, who'd never seen himself in quite this light before, looked vaguely annoyed and said he guessed he would turn in at that if we'd excuse him, and Denise, yawning prettily, said she, too, thought she'd seek the arms of Morpheus.

Gordon was in bed before I'd half got my dress off and asleep before I'd brushed my teeth, but I lay awake for hours wondering about David and if he was hurting and how badly and what he would do about the hurting and if it would change him. I wondered about Angela, too, and how very in love she'd seemed and what could possibly have happened. I finally crept, cold and shivering, over into Gordon's bed and told him I never wanted to be young and in love again. He muttered something about beets and an early planting, which actually was as comforting as anything he could have said even if he'd heard me.

January 9

David's promised letter, fat and bulging, arrived an hour after the Cutlers left in a blaze of gratitude and sprightly vows to see each other again soon. Though the children were in school and the house was quiet, I took the letter up to my room and shut the door.

Dear Mom and Dad: You've been so swell about Angela and everything that I think I owe you a play-by-play account of what happened. I'm sorry it had to happen now with the Cutlers coming, but I thought you ought to know so the four of you wouldn't waste your time talking about Angela and me.

It started as soon as I got back after New Year's. Angela had some fool idea of quitting school and taking a secretarial course so she could get married and support us through my last year of school. Needless to say, I couldn't let her do that. In the first place, it wouldn't be fair to anybody, especially her; and in the second, her family would raise the roof and probably end up by kicking her out. And whatever she says or however she acts, she's crazy about her parents and vice versa, even though they are kind of depressing at times. Besides, after all you and dad have done for me, I don't want you to have to do any more. Besides, marriage, as far as I'm concerned, is a pretty serious business and a lot of responsibilities that Angela hasn't even thought about. I tried to explain all this to her, but she wouldn't listen. She just cried and said I didn't love her or I'd want to get married as soon as possible just like she did. I told her that actually this long-engagement business was probably a lot harder on me than on her but that if we stopped beating our heads against a stone wall and accepted the situation we could have a lot of good times and something to look back on in our old age. But she just went on crying and saying I didn't love her and that actions spoke louder than words. By that time I was pretty miserable about the whole thing and would have given her almost anything to stop her crying but it wasn't lollipops she was crying for so what could I do? I just sat there looking stupid and feeling worse and all of a sudden she jumped up and threw her ring at me and said it had all been a horrible mistake and she never wanted to see me again and that I'd humiliated her deeply.

I don't know an awful lot about women—less every day, I guess—but I thought a lot of what she said was just in the heat of the moment and that after she'd slept on it she'd see my side of it too. I met her at the Nassau the next afternoon. She looked terrible, all worn out, but she hadn't changed her mind a bit. She was calmer and quieter but she said the same things, that I didn't love her or I'd want to help her work things out so we wouldn't have to spend another whole year all tensed up and tired all the time from trying to keep things under control and proper. I said maybe she couldn't see it my way but was that any reason to call off the whole thing and she said it was because it went a lot deeper than that. She said it meant there was a basic lack of understanding between us and that in the end we would only grow to hate each other. She wouldn't take back her ring and I haven't seen her since. I've called every day but she won't come to the phone and now I hear she's been dating a British exchange student hot and heavy, just as though nothing had happened. So this is it. I wrote her a letter today and told her just what I think of her—her shallowness, selfishness, etc., so that finishes it. Sorry you and dad and the Cutlers had to get so involved before we found it was a mistake. Frankly, I feel pretty sick about the whole thing.

Love,
DAVID

When I showed Gordon the letter he said did I think it would do any good if he took a flying trip up there between beets and spinach? I said that all depended on what he intended to do once he got there. I said it all depended on what he thought about the whole thing. He said he didn't know what he thought about the whole thing except that David needed us. He said what did I think about it? I said that I thought Angela had a point. Before Gordon could explode I went on to say that I thought it rather sweet and touching of her to want to go to work for David. Gordon agreed that that part of it might be sweet and touching, but what did I think about her breaking David's heart just because she couldn't get her own way? I said that was childish of her, but that actually she probably felt David had broken her heart. I said that of course David had been right and that I was proud of the maturity he had shown but if he'd been a little more mature he could have perhaps handled it better. I said that after all Angela had offered herself and been rejected and that she was bound to be wounded; Gordon said that what she needed was a good spanking and I said that what she needed was to get married and that I thought we should fish around in the security box at the bank and see what we could do about it. Gordon said he thought we should let them work things out for themselves first and then offer to help. He said he didn't believe in interfering in lovers' quarrels. I burst into tears and said that if we didn't interfere it might be too late. Gordon pulled me down on his lap and lent me his handkerchief and said that was the pain of being parents—the business of standing by and letting your children make their own mistakes. I said that it wasn't fair to stand by and not tell David we would help him, because David wouldn't have any choice unless he knew we were planning to help him and Gordon said that was perfectly true but that Angela had a choice. He said she'd had a choice all along and that she still had one and that we should wait and see what sort of stuff she was made of before we handed over our David.

I knew he was right but I spent the rest of the day going gloomily about the business of housekeeping and child caring while inwardly I carried on long and inconclusive arguments with Angela, with the Cutlers and even with David, on: early marriages and working wives.

January 9

Dear David: I wish I could be with you even though I can't imagine what help I'd be. I also wish I could say in all honesty that Angela has behaved abominably and that what has happened is for the best, but I can't. Angela has simply behaved like a woman, a very young woman, in love, and whether or not it is for the best only time can tell. Be patient with her, darling, and not too proud. We love you.

Dear Janet: We couldn't have had a pleasanter visit than we had with you and your charming husband. A GOOD HAM IS LIKE CA$H IN THE BANK

What flavor dividends in every rosy ounce!

Ham-and-Egg Triumph

Slice four peeled onions thinly and steam, covered, in about one cup water until tender. Cut up one half pound processed American cheese and melt in top of a double boiler over hot water. Keeping the heat low, add onions and juice. Season with salt and pepper. Cut cooked ham into nice substantial slices and sauté on both sides just enough to heat it. Poach an egg per person. Arrange toast or rusk on a platter. Place a slice of ham on each piece, next a poached egg, and blanket all with the cheese sauce. Makes five to six servings.

Spanish Casserole

Here is a dish with the zest of a flamenco dance. In a skillet, saute one and one half pounds diced cooked ham with one cup chopped onions and one clove garlic, crushed, in one tablespoon bacon fat. Add two eight-ounce cans tomato sauce and one half cup water. Simmer until well heated. Mix with three cups drained, cooked rice. Season with one teaspoon salt, pepper to taste, one quarter teaspoon each of thyme and basil and one half teaspoon oregano—that vital Latin herb. Mix one cup cooked or canned peas with ten chopped, pitted ripe olives. Fold into the rice mixture and bake for thirty minutes in a moderate oven, 350° F. Makes six servings.

Ham Pomodora

Sauté one pound diced cooked ham in a little ham fat until golden brown. Add three cups chopped peeled tomatoes and four drops hot red-pepper sauce. Simmer for a few minutes. Then turn out some fluffy scrambled eggs onto a platter and surround with the sauce. Makes four servings.

Florentine Ham

Wash three pounds spinach in several waters, or use three packages frozen spinach. Cook, covered, with one quarter teaspoon salt and just the water that clings to the leaves. Follow package directions for frozen spinach. When it is merely wilted, drain and chop fine. While spinach is cooking, melt two tablespoons bacon drippings in a small saucepan. Add one onion, minced, one and one half teaspoons flour and one third cup liquid from the spinach. Cook until smooth and thickened. Blend in one quarter cup heavy cream, one eighth teaspoon nutmeg, the chopped spinach and salt and pepper to taste. Grind two cups cooked ham. Spoon the spinach into a one-and-one-half-quart casserole, place the ground ham on top and sprinkle with grated Parmesan cheese. Bake in a hot oven, 400° F., for fifteen to twenty minutes, until well heated through. Makes four to five servings. Wonderful for a spring luncheon.

first place and waited awhile before announcing their engagement. I cannot tell from Angela's letter just what happened or how much or how little this has hurt her, but if it was a mistake better to discover it soon than late, though needless to say it causes us considerable embarrassment. At least Angela has undoubtedly learned her lesson and will not be so impetuous in the future.

Thanking you again for making us so welcome.

Dear Mrs. Blair: I guess David has written you about how everything is over. I am truly sorry that things turned out this way. I am returning the brooch because under the circumstances it wouldn't be fair or even decent to keep it, much as I love it and appreciate the sentiment behind it.

Thanking you and Mr. Blair for all your kindness,

Regretfully yours,

Dear Mrs. Blair: I who have already taken such advantage would again ask a kindness. Would you please tell Sallee's mother that I am respectable and serious and dependable, that is if you agree. Sallee, the angel, wishes now to come to spring dance but her mother has prejudice against the French because of something happened to her when she traveled in Canada in her youth. Will you please also tell her Canada is not Paris, not nearly, and that they do not speak even the same language.

Thanking you for all your troubles with me,

RAOUL

P.S. I think Sallee begins to mend the broken heart.

P.P.S. Tell Amanda I have found very serious, fine, pure physics man who shall ask her to dance if you let her come.

Dear Raoul: Mother tells me you are trying to arrange a blind date for me for the spring prom. Though I appreciate your efforts I do wish you wouldn't, as frankly I don't go for blind dates. In fact, frankly, I think the whole idea is rather sordid, you and David scraping around trying to find an escort for me, so I'd rather you'd just drop it.

Isn't it awful about Angela and David? They seemed so terribly in love it makes you wonder just how anyone can ever really know what is the real thing unless, of course, you're the type that's just born knowing.

Give Triquot my love.

Sincerely,
AMANDA

Dear Mom and Dad: I am in a spin. The Cutlers have called twice from Palm Beach and once from New York where they flew this afternoon. It seems Angela pawned her wrist watch (heirloom) and left school and went to New York and got a job clerking in a department store. I didn't know anything about it until Mr. C. called and wanted to know when was the last time I'd seen Angela. When I said it had been weeks he put Mrs. C. on the phone. She sounded hysterical. She said it was all because I'd broken Angela's heart and that the least I could do was to go to New York and try and talk her into going back to school. She said Angela would listen to me. I said that was a laugh but the truth was I was pretty upset too and I couldn't think with her crying into my ear so I said to give me a little time and call me back. Naturally once I'd thought it over what I wanted to do was catch the next train to New York and find out what it was all about but I had an exam at eleven and also I'd forgotten to ask where Angela was staying or what store she was working at so there was nothing to do but sit around and cool my heels and wait for Mrs. C. to call me back which she did in about an hour. She sounded calmed down a bit, said she was sorry if she'd been abrupt with me because they'd been so worried but that they'd finally managed to reach Angela since talking to me and had decided to fly up to New York and straighten things out themselves. When I asked for Angela's address she said that wouldn't be necessary now and probably hadn't been too good an idea in the first place—that is, my seeing Angela. I said I'd still like to have her address please and she suddenly started sniffling again and said hadn't I already done enough damage. I don't know why that made me so sore but it did. I said I didn't know what Angela had told them about our bust-up but, I said, whatever she'd told them they needn't think she had any corner on the broken-heart department. I said I didn't ask to be dragged into this latest fiasco but they had dragged me in and now the least they could do was give me Angela's address. She sniffled some more and gave it to me and said all that she asked was that as long as they were flying up that afternoon I not try to see Angela until after they'd had a chance to talk to her, to which I agreed.

Now, mom, the point is this. I'm going up to New York tomorrow morning. Of course I don't even know if Angela will see me, much less what all this means, but I've been thinking and it seems to me it could mean that she's still carrying the torch and wants to show me that she can be independent of her family and a working girl. Though to you this may all look (her running away, etc.) pretty melodramatic and childish, it is actually the only way she could have pulled it off, her parents feeling as they do about things. Anyhow I think before I see her I ought to have made up my own mind what I'm going to say if the above reason is why she's done this and I've about made up my mind to tell her to stick to her guns and let's get married this June. I know this isn't fair to you, which is why I didn't do it long ago, but the point is if I let her down now it's really finished for us. I know, and she's my girl, ma, the only one for me. I know you and dad will understand. You always do and I'll see to it that you don't have to shell out any more than you have been. I can get my old job back in the campus store and pick up some odd jobs on Sundays and Angela can swing her end of it—obviously. Just wanted you to know before I took the plunge. Wish me luck.

Your loving son,
DAVID

Dear Amanda: I am shocked you should believe David and I must "scraping around" for escort for you when it is quite opposite. Three boys seeing your picture have begged that we choose them for you but we choose Martin because he is more the type for one's sister, serious and pure. So please, please do not disappoint him. He would write himself only he is shy and scared you think him bold. Also everything depend on you as Sallee can come only if you come. Her mother has said it. So please, please do not break my heart and that of Martin.

Dear Janet: Just a note to tell you that Angela and David will be married at Saint Bartholomew's Chapel on June eighteenth of this year with the reception following at Brooke Hall. We will try our best to make it the beautiful occasion we had always dreamed of in spite of our disappointment at the way things have worked out.

When I can pull myself together and organize my thoughts I shall write to you at greater length regarding invitations, lists, et cetera. Reginald and I shall of course want you and the children to stay at Brooke Hall with us.

VALENTINE'S DAY

February 14

I woke to the muffled sound of tiptoeing feet and whispered "sh-h-h's" and valiantly kept my eyes closed until I heard the twins bounding away down the hall. I opened them to two large pink hearts pasted over with bluebirds, forget-me-nots and paper lace,

...any of these glorious glazes made with jelly or jam and FRENCH'S MUSTARD...

Irresistible! The exciting combination of flavors you get when you glaze a ham with jelly or jam and French's Mustard! Made with a special blend of secret seasonings and mustard seeds, French's has a light and lively flavor that won't fade out in cooking—won't freeze out, either.

And is it ever smooth . . . just about the smoothest-mixing mustard made because it's double-creamed. On food...in food, French's Mustard tastes best, does most. Get a jar!

...here are your easy recipes

Apricot—Combine ½ cup Apricot Jam, with ¼ cup French's Mustard, and a dash of ground cloves or cinnamon. Beautiful in color, good, too.

Grape—Follow recipe for Apricot Glaze, using Grape Jelly instead of Apricot—or any tart jelly such as currant or plum. Bright in flavor. Don't skip this one.

Cranberry—Mix ½ cup jellied whole cranberry sauce, crushed, with ½ cup brown sugar and ¼ cup French's Mustard. Good on lamb, too.

French's All-Time Favorite—Mix together 1 cup brown sugar, 2 tbsps. flour, ¼ cup French's Mustard. Spread on ham. Everyone loves it.

General Directions: Bake ham as usual. 15 minutes before ham is done, take out of oven; remove rind, if any; score fat criss-cross and spread ham with any of these glazes. Arrange pineapple chunks in flower shapes (secure chunks with toothpicks). Add clove centers as shown. Put ham back in 450° oven for 15 minutes.

propped upright on the table beside my bed. On the backs were scribbled the expected "Guess whos" but Johnny, never one for anonymity, had placed his initials in tiny letters at the bottom. I turned to share my treasures with Gordon but he was gone and, looking at the clock, I saw to my horror that it was almost nine-thirty. I leaped out of bed and into my clothes wondering just how I could word the tardy excuses the children would have to take to school so as not to reveal that their mother was a lazy sloth when suddenly I remembered it was "teachers' institute." I also remembered it was the day I'd promised to go shopping with Amanda, who, now that she'd made up her mind to sacrifice herself to Raoul and Sally and the spring prom, was engaged in such a frenzy of preparation you'd have thought the thing was taking place next week instead of almost two months hence. An attitude which, gritting my teeth, I encouraged.

I also remembered it was the day I'd promised to help Mother Blair entertain her garden club and the day I'd meant to steal an hour in which to write a private valentine verse to my husband because I never had and had always wanted to.

It turned out to be the day that Mrs. Cutler's letter arrived and Amanda, deciding she might be asked to be a bridesmaid, deferred her shopping until she could work out the intricacies of prom clothes, bridesmaid's clothes and a budget that would have to take care of both.

It turned out to be the day that I decided if I was to be the mother of the groom I'd have to go on a diet and do some grotesque hipline exercises and look into the new hair styles.

It also turned out to be the day that Sally dropped in just as I was dressing for Mother Blair's and sat on my bed and asked me what did I think about Raoul, really. She said she frankly found him utterly terrifying. She said she wasn't used to men whose emotions spilled all over everything and how could you tell when they spilled over you if it meant anything? She said what she'd liked about David was he was so easy to be with. Raoul, she said, was exhausting and did I think that was healthy? I said that depended on whether she had stamina enough. She blushed and said that wasn't what she'd meant at all. What she'd meant was did I think it queer that someone could be so, well, interested in someone that always left them feeling as though they'd been dragged over a roller coaster by the hair. I said being interested in someone often made one feel like that. She looked immensely relieved and said in that case she'd stop lying awake nights wondering where all this was leading to.

And then suddenly, surprisingly her eyes filled with tears and she said, "Wherever it leads it's something of my own. I never did stand a chance with David, you know. Not even when he was between girls, really. There's not even anything to remember except how I felt about him."

It also turned out to be the day I came down with the flu and was driven home from Mother Blair's by a worried Gordon who put me to bed with a hot toddy, orange juice, aspirins and two nameless brown capsules he took once when he had malaria. He also helped Amanda get supper for everyone, shushed the twins, and peered in at me every half hour or so to ask if I was feeling any better. I enjoyed it while it lasted because I knew from experience that, having devoted an entire evening to nursing me back to health, he would expect me to be completely recovered by morning. However, this is the break I've been looking for ever since Christmas and I've no intention of recovering until I've finished the whodunit I started two weeks ago, the sweater for David started before Thanksgiving, a box of chocolates confiscated at Christmas and hiding in the top drawer of my desk ever since and the awesome-looking book on yoga and the Contemplative Life which was Mother Blair's Christmas present to me.

Dear Amanda: Just a note dashed off between breakfast and a mad dash for the subway to ask you if you will be in my wedding. Mumsy is attending to all the bridesmaid dresses—pale green, which should look marvelous on you—she wants to get the measurements off to Hattie Carnegie this week so please send same presto.

Don't tell anybody, but I'm mad about my job. You see all kinds of people and every day something funny happens.

Love to all,

P.S. Am so glad you're coming up for the prom especially as Martin is going to be an usher and it will be nice for you to have somebody you already know in the wedding—that is, besides David and me and Raoul.

Dear Janet: Have received your invitation list and while it is most thoughtful of you to offer to help address them, I've engaged one of Reginald's secretaries to help me with all these details. I noticed that you did not include Albert Goings, David's father, on your list. Was this intentional? It seems that my cousin who is a friend of Mr. Goings' wife has told them (the Goings) of Angela's coming marriage to David and apparently Mr. Goings is most anxious to receive an invitation. It has occurred to me that the omission of his name on your list was simply an oversight. On the other hand, if it was deliberate we shall certainly respect your wishes in the matter.

Dear Ma: I don't know what to say about Mrs. Cutler's letter except that I wish you and dad would do whatever you want to on it. Naturally I'm a bit curious to see what the old man looks like, but whether he comes to the wedding or not couldn't matter less. I wonder why he should want to after all these years. Do you suppose he's getting sentimental in his old age? Still say it's up to you folks. If he does come he'll just be another guest as far as I'm concerned, but I can see that you might not feel that way.

No news here. Am working like six dogs and won't see Angela until the prom, which isn't far off but seems like years. Am looking forward, too, to seeing Amanda and Sally. Tell Amanda not to bring any books or notebooks as the girls will all be staying together at the same place and it might get her off to a bad start with them. Love to all,

THE PROM

April 15

Amanda and Sally returned from Princeton today and though Gordon had to go to Charleston on business and there were a thousand and one things demanding my immediate attention here, I trumped up a few imperative city errands for the simple reason that I couldn't wait to hear all about the weekend. Amanda, as the time approached to go, had thrown herself into the adventure with increasing enthusiasm, but I'd begun at the last minute to have qualms. I was afraid that in spite of everything she was still nurturing dreams of a happy ending with Raoul. I was afraid the pure physicist would be a ghastly bore and that she wouldn't like him in the least. I was afraid Amanda would go into one of her sulks and he wouldn't like her in the least. I was afraid she'd be a wallflower at the dance. I was afraid she'd catch cold because she always does when she's unhappy.

It was a beautiful spring morning and on the drive over, Gordon and I had a chance to get caught up on a lot of unfinished business such as should he raise his foreman now or wait and see how the tomatoes went and what were we to do about Tuck's stammer which was brand-new and seemed vaguely connected with dancing school which was also brand-new and which he adored and feared with equal fervor.

It's always a jolt to my perspective to view one of my children from a distance made up not only of space but of time. As I watched Amanda alight from the plane she was momentarily as much a stranger to me as the man ahead of her or the woman behind. She looked groomed and poised and slightly disdainful peering over the tops of heads, in a detached way, until she saw us. She waved indifferently and stood aside at the foot of the ramp and waited for Sally to catch up with her.

I'd been sure that the minute I saw Amanda I'd know what sort of time she'd had. Her eyes would either sparkle or they'd have that touch-me-not withdrawn look. I'd also been sure that whatever sort of time she'd had, we'd hear about it the moment she alighted. But her eyes told me nothing, and to my breathless "Well?" as soon as we were in the car she said pleasantly enough "Well what?" as though I were a backward child who needed prompting, and settled down into a corner of the back seat. Gordon gave me a sidewise warning glance and so I subsided and tried to gather from Sally's uninhibited chatter and an occasional glance in the rear-view mirror just what this new Amanda was all about.

Sally said it had all been divine, absolutely divine—hadn't it, Amanda?—and Amanda nodded expressionlessly. Sally said she'd had no idea a Northern town could have so much Southern atmosphere or that Northern girls could be so friendly and didn't Amanda agree? Amanda agreed expressionlessly. She said Angela and David looked marvelous and were divinely in love, weren't they, Amanda? Amanda said "Obviously." Sally said Angela had literally begged her to come to their wedding and so had Raoul and so she thought that she would and wouldn't that be divine? To this Amanda repeated "Divine" and Gordon gave me a sidewise glance that said, It's that Frenchman again, that's what's the matter with her, and I quickly said to Sally, not to Amanda, "And what was Martin like?" Sally said that Martin was a perfect darling, not very good-looking or anything like that but real sweet and a perfect darling, wasn't he, Amanda? Amanda nodded expressionlessly.

It wasn't until we dropped Sally off at her house that the silence became really oppressive. Gordon tried a jovial "How does it feel to be a prom trotter?" which elicited a shrug and I tried a less jovial "How does it feel to be home?" which elicited an unconvincing "Fine."

Gordon carried her suitcases up to her room and came down looking baffled and wounded. He said she hadn't even thanked him, had hardly seemed to know he was there, had just stood there waiting patiently for him to leave so she could take a bath. He said we should never have let her go, that he knew it all along. He said she'd been hurt, her spirit broken. He said obviously she'd had a rough go of it in some way because obviously it had done something to her though he couldn't say just what but whatever it was she wasn't the same girl that had got on the plane less than a week ago and by Jove he'd like to get to the bottom of it. By Jove he'd like to give that Frenchman a talking to.

I said maybe it was Amanda who needed the talking to. I said after all, Raoul was a perfectly nice boy, a perfectly kind boy. I said he had never pretended to be interested in her except as a friend and had been crazy about Sally ever since he laid eyes on her and had never made any bones about it, all of which Amanda knew before she ever went to Princeton, and that if she was going to let this sort of frustration blight what could and should have been, according to Sally, a perfectly divine time, then I said she most certainly did need a talking to. Gordon said if I said one harsh word to that poor unhappy child he'd—he'd—well, he didn't see how I could be so unfeeling. As though summoned by this outburst, the poor unhappy child appeared and asked what on earth was all the shouting about. She had had a bath and changed into blue jeans and one of Gordon's old shirts. She looked pink-cheeked and bright-eyed and wanted to know when was lunch because she was utterly famished, had in fact never been so utterly famished in all her life.

Between gulps of oyster stew she told the twins all about the trip up and the trip back complete with stops, weather reports, and a graphic description of how the earth looked at ten thousand feet. Between mouthfuls of ground-beef-and-mushroom patties she regaled Gordon and me with an hour-by-hour accounting of her time from the moment she and Sally arrived at the Newark airport until Raoul and "Marty" put them aboard the plane again three days later.

Having finished her dessert, she leaned back contentedly and sighed and said that Marty had asked her to wear his fraternity pin but she'd refused, not because she didn't like him—he was awfully nice, really, even if he did take life too seriously and didn't know the first thing about dancing and was considered somewhat of a drip by the smoother boys—but because she didn't want to lead him on. He had also asked her to write to him, which she thought she would do because that wouldn't be leading him on, would it, and he was awfully nice really.

At that point Gordon, in spite of a dark look from me, exploded with, "What was so awfully nice really about him?"

Amanda smiled and pushed back her chair, stretched and smiled again, this time in a new and, I thought, somewhat secretive way and said to be perfectly honest she supposed what was really so nice about him really was that for some crazy reason he was completely mad about her. The smile became less secretive, spilled over into a giggle and she said that for some crazy reason he thought she was the most exciting girl he'd ever met. She said, "Have you ever heard of anything quite so madly crazy in all your life?"

I looked at Gordon and Gordon looked at me and Tuck said no, he never had.

It was hours before I dared ask her what the trouble had been on the drive home, but I finally did when we were alone together in the kitchen washing supper dishes. She smiled that same secretive smile I'd noticed earlier and said she hadn't been aware of acting as though anything was the matter but if she had acted that way it was because she had never in her life been so hungry. Martin, she said, was on a scholarship and terribly poor, so to save him chow money she had pretended she was on a very strict diet for her health and she hadn't had anything to eat but soup and toast for two whole days. Coming home in the car, she said, she just let Sally carry the conversation while she sat back and dreamed of what she'd have for lunch.

CORRESPONDENCE

May 30

Dear Janet: I am sorry you people aren't going to fly up so that you will be in time for Aunt Abigail's tea on Thursday, but trust you will be here for the rehearsal party Friday night which Cousin Moseley Cutler is having at Briarbrook Farm, white tie, and for the bride's luncheon on Saturday, tweeds, which Cousin Sibley Moseley is having at the country club.

If Mr. Blair will telephone when you reach Peekskill someone will drive out to the Texaco station that is situated on the right-hand side of the road as you come into Aenead-on-the-Hudson and lead the way out here, as it is quite complicated and directions can be confusing.

We will expect you and Mr. Blair and the twins to stay here at Brooke Hall and Amanda, too, if she'd like to, but most of the young people will be staying with Aunt Abigail and I imagine she will prefer to be with them.

You will be relieved to know that the Albert Goings have not received invitations to either the rehearsal party or the luncheon and will therefore be here only for the wedding and reception and plan to return to New York that very night.

Sincerely yours,
DENISE CUTLER

P.S. Is Sally Dunn a friend of Amanda's or of David's or is she a contemporary of yours? We are, of course, delighted that she is coming, but am at somewhat of a loss as to whether to place her with Aunt Abigail or at the inn, where she would perhaps be more comfortable. Not having Angela here until next week makes everything so complicated!

D.C.

AENEAD-ON-THE-HUDSON

June 17

Somehow we missed the Texaco station where I'd planned not only to call our hosts but also to do something about my lipstick and the twins' cowlicks, and arrived at Brooke Hall at dusk hungry, tired and slightly grimy at the edges. As we inched up the steep stony driveway toward the immense hideously turreted structure that we'd been informed, down the road, was our destination, Tuck asked anxiously if he and Johnny could please have a room together. Gordon said he'd often seen places like this from a distance and wondered if anybody actually lived in them. I said I'd always just assumed that Charles Addams lived in them and Amanda, snatching the comb out of my bag, said please did we have to be so superior about everything just because the Cutlers were rich, that she personally thought it was a perfect dream of a castle and a marvelous atmosphere for writing poetry and no wonder Mrs. Cutler did. The place was lit up like a Christmas tree, which helped, and the manservant who let us in, having ascertained we were honestly related to the groom and not just lost and asking directions to the nearest filling station, took us straight to our rooms, which also helped, though I longed for a glimpse of David, whom I'd not seen since January, and would also have been somewhat reassured by a glimpse of our host or hostess, though I had heard as we were whisked down a hall past parlors, libraries, conservatories, and so on, the sound of human voices and gathered that the house was inhabited. Gordon and I were deposited in a small, elegant suite on the third floor and the twins, looking awed and not a little frightened, were led off to another part of the house where I could only hope they'd have the good sense to take baths and change their shirts. Amanda remained with us, but only after the manservant had consulted a small black notebook whose message was apparently that Miss Blair was to dress here for the rehearsal and party following at Briarbrook, after which she would go to Miss Abigail Cutler's for the night. As soon as he'd gone Amanda said didn't we think it time Bertha addressed her with a little more respect. Gordon asked were we supposed just to wait here until somebody happened to say to somebody, "Whatever do you suppose happened to the Blairs?" I said I thought I'd take a bath but I found I couldn't because Amanda had already beat me to it. Gordon said, "What, only one bathroom for the two of us?" and I kicked off my shoes and stretched out on a bed.

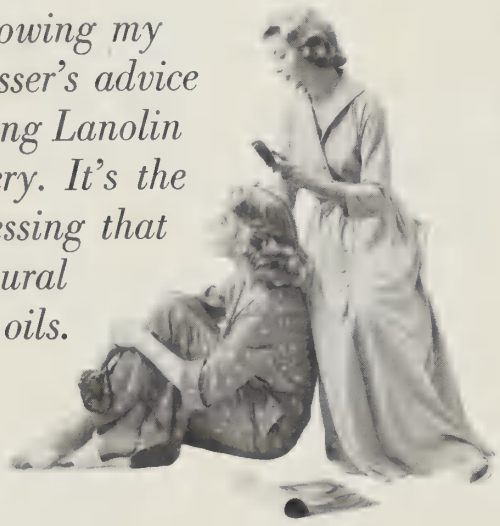
There was a rap on the door and Denise, on the other side, said, "Samson only just told me you were here." I did a quick plunge from bed into shoes. Gordon opened the door and Denise in silver lamé floated in just as Amanda in towels floated out of the bathroom. Denise said why hadn't we called from the Texaco place so that she could have given us a real welcome and how soon could we come down and meet everyone because everyone was dying to meet us. Though Amanda would have to hurry as the rehearsal was at seven, we needn't hurry as the dinner at the Moseley Cutlers' wasn't until eight and everyone always took his time getting there. She paused to smile fatuously at Gordon, and I, trying not to sound wistful, asked if David was anywhere around. Denise said last time she'd seen him he and some French friend of his had been going out the back door with a snack for some friend of theirs called Triquot who she hoped was not a girl as there weren't any extra men for the dancing.

Amanda had fortunately had time to shed towels for evening dress when there was another rap on the door and David, on the other side, said, "Open up," and there he was, the darling. There were also Raoul and Sally and a scrawny sad youth with bright red hair and rather appealing eyes who was never introduced to us but who eventually turned out to be Amanda's Martin.

I completely forgot about the twins until Samson appeared and without referring to the little black notebook once said that a Mrs. Bob Butler had come and taken the boys over to her house for supper and that when she returned them he, Samson, would personally put them to bed. It hadn't occurred to me or the twins that they, like all the other details of a large wedding, would be efficiently arranged for and I could only hope they were taking it manfully.

After the raucous reunion in our suite the group in evening dress gathered in the drawing room downstairs appeared frighteningly elegant and sedate. The young people had all gone off to the rehearsal and this was what was left—the Cutler hierarchy. I yearned for Mother Blair with her pearls and her brooches and the ivory-topped cane she always carried on "trying" occasions, but nothing could have persuaded her to leave her garden at this time of year and the truth was she avoided weddings and funerals alike because they always made her cry and she considered tears in public the worst possible calamity.

Denise first introduced us to the Moseley Cutlers, a gray-haired, florid man in his late fifties with an extraordinarily young wife. Gordon, who is wonderful at putting names and facts together, remembered that it was the Moseley Cutlers who owned Briarbrook Farm and was able, after trying cattle and fruit trees unsuccessfully, to launch a sprightly conversation pertaining to the New York Central Railroad. Mrs. Moseley Cutler, seeing that I was somewhat adrift when it came to corporations and monopolies, introduced me to Aunt Abigail, a tiny wisp of an old lady with a theatrically pitched voice and probing eyes, who in turn introduced me to her niece, Sibley Moseley, also a spinster and the career girl of the family by dint of her own apartment in New York, where she managed a large bookstore. She, it seemed, was giving the bride's luncheon the next day and, overwhelmed with the responsibility, kept dashing away to "confer" with Denise. It was while she was on one of these little forays that a small, brown, mousy woman whom I'd already picked as the sort always assigned to look after the groom's mother sidled up to me, introduced herself as Mary, Robin's wife, and said if there was anyone I hadn't met—or whose name I needed to be prompted on —— I asked her about the particularly vivacious redhead who seemed to have rescued Gordon from the New York Central and plunged him straight into some huge joke which the two of them were convulsed over. Mary, Robin's wife, said that that was Mrs. Dell, and when I still looked blank added, "One of Reggie's little compensations. Actually one of his secretaries, but no one really blames him. Denise lives in such a cloud. Not that she isn't forever falling in and out of love, too, but on such a high plane there's no keeping track of it."



On second look I decided that what had appeared mouselike about Robin's Mary was simply that she didn't look like a Cutler. I was just about to strike for more local color while the iron was hot when Aunt Abigail, in a voice that silenced even Mrs. Dell's convulsive laughter, said that we could all stay here if we liked but she was going to Moseley's and eat

ENDS DULL DRY "THIRSTY" HAIR

Q: How do you make your hair so lustrous and shining?

A: By following my hairdresser's advice and using Lanolin Discovery. It's the greaseless hairdressing that replaces natural beauty oils.

Q: What's the difference between Lanolin Discovery and other hairdressings?

A: Ordinary hairdressings "coat" your hair —make it oily— Lanolin Discovery's misty fine spray is absorbed into every hair right down to your scalp.

To enhance the natural color of your hair—to get a shimmery satiny sheen with deep fascinating highlights, just spray on LANOLIN DISCOVERY Hairdressing and brush a little. In just seconds, you get the same beautiful results as brushing your hair 100 strokes a day.

if she had to eat alone. The response to this clarion call was immediate and impressive; wraps were fetched and within five minutes we were on our way to "Moseley's." I had rather hoped for a glimpse of Gordon somewhere along the way, but Denise, producing a little black book which was the twin of the one Samson carried, shuttled us into cars and I found myself stuffed between Robin's Mary and a strange sandy-haired young man in the back seat of a limousine driven by a chauffeur. As soon as the motor started Robin's Mary clicked off the speaking tube that connected us with the front seat and said had I ever seen anything like the way everyone jumped like rabbits when Aunt Abigail cracked the whip? She said though she'd been married to a Cutler for eight years she'd never understood how they worked out the business of rank. Aunt Abigail, she said, was neither the oldest nor the richest and yet she was undisputed matriarch of the entire tribe. The sandy-haired young man yawned and said it was all a matter of character. Aunt Abigail, he said, had character, but Robin's Mary took exception to this; she said if it were a matter of character then Moseley was her choice. Moseley, she said, was the only one who'd ever done anything. It evolved that what Moseley had done was to give up his seat on the stock exchange in order to raise beagle hounds and write articles for Sportsman. The sandy-haired young man yawned again and said that was all very jolly but what in the blue blazes did raising beagles have to do with character? Robin's Mary said it showed independence at least but that surely he'd admit that getting rid of Rita and marrying Bette had taken character.

The young people were at Briarbrook before us and Angela, whom I'd not seen since I arrived, greeted me at the door. She was even prettier than I'd remembered, but she was beginning to get that cornered, frantic look common to brides on the eve of a large wedding, and I was only mildly surprised when halfway through dinner she excused herself and we learned later in a kind of whispered grapevine over the coffee that she was upstairs in Bette's bedroom having hysterics. I looked around for David and saw that he was in agonized consultation with Denise in the hall. I longed to tell him that bridal hysterics are as common as colds in winter and have nothing whatsoever to do with the groom, even though at this very moment Angela was probably sobbing that it had all been a terrible mistake and that she simply couldn't go through with it.

However, Aunt Abigail was telling me about the time she caught a burglar single-handed armed with a flashlight and a piece of garden hose and I didn't dare interrupt her. When I again looked both Denise and David had disappeared. The rest of the evening went by in a sort of blur of Cutler faces and Cutler voices through which I occasionally heard my own voice making polite mother-of-the-groom conversation while my mind ticked away the hours and minutes until, shed of girdle and the French heels Amanda had insisted on, I could be myself again.

It was after midnight when Gordon and I finally fell into the Louis Quinze beds at Brooke Hall. Gordon presently said he couldn't sleep because it was too hot in there. He got up and opened a window presently said it was too cold and got up closed it. I said why didn't he try coun Cutlers jumping over a fence? He said d think the twins were all right or should go check? When I didn't answer he said what about David, he hadn't seen him hours. I said I hoped David was asleep as I had been until the temperature sta rising and falling so rapidly. Gordon said was awfully sorry if he'd waked me up and t I must go right back to sleep because tom row was going to be even worse than tod

I agreed sleepily and he said did I have qualms about seeing Goings again? I h enough qualms to say emphatically that I not and found suddenly that I was w awake. Gordon, yawning, said he was awfu glad I had no qualms and went immediat to sleep. I lay awake for a long time stari at the ceiling and wondering if David w really taking all this as easily as he appear to be and if somehow somewhere I cou manage to be alone with him for a few mi utes before the we ding and just wh I'd say if I were. also wondered if would recogni Romeo's understu among the hordes strange faces or if would have to introduced.

June

Everybody we around all morni telling one anoth that it couldn't be more beautiful da for a wedding, whic was perfectly tru and I would hav been in a beautifu frame of mind for wedding if I coul have got into som old clothes and wan dered off all alon and sat on a hil somewhere an thought about Davi and Angela and love but instead I had t climb into my girdle again and go to the bride's luncheon.

I was reunited briefly with the twins in the billiard room just before we left for the country club, but it was much like visiting them at camp where, having established themselves in a new and alien environment, they'd treated me coolly and with a certain amount of distrust. A Satanic-looking little boy several years their senior who they obviously thought was terrific was teaching them the game and they listened with only the vaguest pretense of hearing to my last-minute instructions on what they were to wear to the church and how they were to conduct themselves at the reception.

I had rather hoped at the luncheon to have a chance to hobnob with the young people, but I should have known better. The status of mother of the groom being what it is, I again found myself being looked after by Robin's Mary before lunch and at lunch again seated on Mr. Reginald Cutler's left, and afterward again listening to one of Aunt Abigail's almost interminable legends, this time about the time she'd somehow or other got herself on the wrong boat and gone to England instead of Nassau.

In the ladies' room where I repaired to shake the fog of England from my bones I encountered Amanda putting on a new and ominously dark mouth which she explained breezily was for one of the groomsmen whom I'd not yet met but who was a perfect dream of a dancer and thought she was twenty and somehow related to the Cutlers. I said what about Martin and she tossed her hair in the way that Angela does and said what about

NEXT MONTH

"The whole of Delhi is standing on my doorstep with hands joined, begging for my daughter," said Lalaji proudly.

● Nimmi was already eighteen and every day Lalaji's wife, his sons, his other daughters pleaded with him: "Arrange a marriage for Nimmi!" Yet Lalaji could not bear to lose his Nimmi, his pearl. "She is yet young," he protested.

Nimmi vowed she would never marry. She longed to be like her friend Rajen—modern, fashionable, free to bob her hair and go to night clubs. Free, most of all, to flirt with her two admirers: the handsome Pheroze, and the gay young man who skipped when he walked.

A PRINCE FOR NIMMI

m? I said bluntly, because there wasn't uch time and because I wasn't at all sure I as going to like this Aenead-on-the-Hudson manda, that though I'd seen him for only a w minutes I'd liked Martin very much. I id that even if she didn't like him very much e should be nice to him because he obvisly was mad about her and didn't deserve have his heart broken in quite so ruthss a fashion. I added that having someone love with you whether you liked it or ot was a responsibility of sorts and not to be eated lightly. Amanda put the finishing ouches on her mouth and, turning around, ave me an affectionate and somewhat maernal pat and said there was nothing to get xcited about, absolutely nothing, that of ourse she wouldn't hurt Martin, not for anyhing in the world because he was such a arling really and besides, she said, having a an in love with you, any man, was, like the ight clothes, a luxury but essential, positively ssential. With another toss of her hair she athered up her pocketbook and departed.

The wedding was at five, but because I anted a little space in which just to sit in a allowed place and think my own thoughts Gordon and the twins and I got to the church t four-thirty and whom should we find wanering around among the tombstones but Romeo's understudy? His back was to us but knew him; I knew that back, it was David's ack, straight and lean and possibly a little rrogant. I paused and clutched Gordon's and in a warning clasp and just then Albert urned and I experienced a moment of panic wondering if he would know me and then he miled that old half-tender smile that used to go straight down my spine and into my toes nd walked toward us, bringing with him a all, dark woman with enormous tired eyes nd a dissipated mouth. He said, quite as hough we'd been in touch yesterday, that he nd Lollita had thought the wedding was at four-thirty and were just deciding they'd got heir dates mixed when we happened along. He then introduced Lollita as his wife and I ntroduced Gordon and the twins. We stood around awkwardly for a moment talking about what a beautiful day it was for a wedding and then mercifully Lollita saw someone she knew and we disbanded. As we walked into the church I stole a sidewise glance at Gordon to see what sort of impression my past had made on him and hoped he would not notice that my hands were trembling and that if he did he would attribute it to a state common to mothers of grooms, but he was staring straight ahead wearing his going-to-church expression which I'd always found completely impenetrable and which at this moment made him seem frighteningly far away and out of reach.

The church, like so much of Aenead-on-the-Hudson, was Gothic and pretentious and forbidding, but I concentrated on the way the afternoon sun illuminated the stained-glass windows and touched the altar with a soft and gentle light, and pretty soon the trembling in my hands was stilled and I could, as I'd planned, think my own thoughts for a little while before the music of the wedding march thundered in my ears and I looked up and saw David, white faced and solemn, waiting at the altar. The rest is vague, a series of impressions: the look of hurt surprise Reginald Cutler wore when he returned to his pew after giving his daughter away; Amanda, a beautiful, misty-eyed stranger in her bridesmaid's gown, tossing David a chin-up glance; the twins' stifled giggle when David kissed Angela; and Angela's radiance distilled to a grave, trusting smile as David swept her down the aisle.

The nice thing about the receiving line was that David and Angela, Raoul and Amanda—all the people I hadn't seen for years—were in it, and we could, in the little empty spaces between handshakes, exchange pleasantries. Amanda said she'd never realized before how much poetry there was in the Episcopal prayer book, that while she and the other bridesmaids had been waiting for Angela she'd read it, really read it—parts of it—and some of it was pure poetry. Raoul said that personally he liked less poetry and more meat with his prayings. David said please not so loud and Angela said, "Shush, David, you're not supposed to talk in a receiving line, just 'How do you do' and 'Thank you' and 'I'm sure we will be.'"

I'd dreaded the moment when Albert and David would meet and wondered how it could be anything but a kind of ludicrous experience for both of them, father and son meeting for the first time in, of all places, a wedding receiving line. However, I felt they must have encountered each other somehow before the wedding because there was neither curiosity nor self-consciousness in their handshake. I heard Albert murmur something about a beautiful bride and all the luck in the world and David's noncommittal "Thank you, sir," and realized that the reason why David's expression at that moment revealed nothing more than polite interest was undoubtedly that that was all he felt.

I finally caught David alone for a moment in the laundry room behind the kitchen, where he'd gone to retrieve the "going-away suit" he'd hidden there the night before. I thought, This is it, the moment of parting from my son, my first-born, heart of my heart; I said, "Darling, you never should have hung the suit in here. Look how mussed it is." He said, "It's nothing to what it would have been if I'd left it where the ushers could have got their hands on it." He looked frightfully adult and frightfully scared—in an adult way. I thought, Now is the time when I should say all the things . . . how proud I am . . . what a joy he has been . . . how happy we want him to be but that even more than that we want him to make Angela happy because therein happiness lies. . . . I said, "Please, darling, don't drink any more champagne because you've got to drive"; he said, "Oh, for heaven's sake, ma! I'm a man now, remember? The minister just pronounced me one, a man and wife. That's me." He grinned and I thought, If only I could kiss him without crying. I said, "Have you packed your razor? You always forget to pack your razor." He said he had not only packed his razor but razor blades as well. He looked nervously at his watch and I said, "You'd better be getting into that suit." He said he guessed he'd better.

He paused halfway to the door looking as though there was something else he wanted to say if he only knew what. My throat filled and my eyes began to sting. I said, "Run along with you now. Someday you're going to make some woman a wonderful husband." He grinned and bent and kissed me lightly on the forehead. He said, "Do what you can with the twins; they're laying for us—bags and bags of rice." And he was gone.

I found Gordon talking to Reginald Cutler and a handsome brunette whom I'd never seen before. I could not help wondering if she were one of Reginald's "little compensations" and was just about to find out when Romeo's understudy took me by the elbow and steered me straight into one of the imported palm trees and himself into a large bucket of ice which one of the waiters must have forgotten. He begged my pardon and that of the palm tree, hiccuped softly and said he'd been trying to get me alone ever since he got there to tell me how lovely I was, how completely and perfectly lovely and what a wonderful, wonderful, yes truly wonderful job I'd done on "our" boy. For a minute I wondered whom he was talking about and then I said that he himself didn't look ■ day older, not a day, and that I thought his wife charming, perfectly charming. He listed a little to the windward, grasped the palm tree for support and said his wife was a perfect shrew and he hadn't had one happy hour since he left me. I cast a despondent look in Gordon's direction; Gordon nodded and smiled encouragingly. The understanding husband. Romeo's understudy listed to the leeward and clutched at my shoulder for support. He said, "But I did love you, you know. As much as I'm capable. It's just, just"—he unloosed my shoulder and stood almost straight, balancing himself with a slight swaying motion from the hips like one of those wind-up toys—"it's just that I loved myself more. Always have. Sorry," he said, and for a moment his eyes cleared and looked straight into mine with a little of the old bravado, the old charm. I said, "You mustn't be sorry," and because he seemed dubious, I said, "First you gave me David and then you let me find Gordon. You mustn't ever be sorry. I'm one of the happiest women alive."

"I drink too much," he said forlornly. "Tomorrow I won't even remember—and I want to. . . . Have you seen that wife of mine? Better find her before it's too late, only it always is," he said and went to find her, he who'd never even found himself.

There was a commotion in the hall, which meant the bride and groom were about to make their getaway. I looked around for the twins, but they were nowhere in sight. Gordon, moving with the crowd toward the hall, grasped my hand. "I'm an old hand at weddings," he said. "Just follow me." He got us somehow through the crowd and out onto the lawn just as the front door opened and Angela and David were catapulted out in a storm of rice. They didn't see us, and I barely saw them. They dashed for their car and, flushed and disheveled, drove away in the cream-colored convertible which was a present from the bride's father. It wasn't until they were almost out of sight that I realized to my horror that the two blobs in the back window which I'd assumed to be baggage were the twins, their noses pressed against the window, their arms waving triumphantly. RECIPES FOR FREEZER DIET

All main-dish recipes make four servings. They appear here in the order of preparation.

POACHED SCALLOPS

Simmer gently 1 can chicken broth, a dash of salt, ⅛ teaspoon pepper and 1 clove garlic, crushed. Cool. Add 2 pounds fresh uncooked scallops cut into bite-size pieces and 3 tablespoons chopped parsley. Pour into 4 individual freezing containers, cover and freeze.
To serve: Thaw just enough to remove from containers. Heat in top of a double boiler until thawed and well heated through.

STUFFED GREEN PEPPERS

Cut out the top, seeds and white membrane of 4 green peppers. Simmer them in salted water for about 5 minutes. Remove, drain, salt and pepper the insides.
Filling: Brown 1 pound ground round steak in a lightly salted hot skillet. Add ⅔ cup finely chopped onion and cook until it is tender. Season with ¼ teaspoon salt, ¼ teaspoon orégano and ⅛ teaspoon pepper. Add ½ cup tomato sauce and ½ cup beef bouillon. Simmer gently for a few minutes. Then add 1 tablespoon chopped parsley and stuff the peppers. Place in individual freezing containers. Pour over each 2 tablespoons tomato sauce. Cool, cover and freeze.
To serve: Allow to thaw just enough to remove from the containers. Place in a baking dish and cover with aluminum foil. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., until peppers are heated through, about 20–25 minutes.

SPONGECAKE

To the egg whites in 1 package of angel-food-cake mix add 1 cup of water and follow the directions on the package for making the meringue. Beat together about ½ minute the flour mixture, 3 unbeaten egg yolks, 2 teaspoons grated lemon rind and ⅓ cup water. Then carefully fold this into the meringue. Pour into two 9″x5″x3″ loaf pans and bake in a moderately hot oven, 375° F., 20–25 minutes. Remove from the oven and invert the pans until cool. Take cakes out of their pans. Wrap well in aluminum foil or transparent plastic wrap and freeze.
To serve: Allow the cake to stand at room temperature 25–30 minutes before cutting. Each serving is 1½″x3″x3″.

BROILED LIVER PATTIES

Pour boiling salted water over 1¼ pounds of calves' liver. Simmer for a few minutes. Remove the skin and tough membrane. Put the liver through the food chopper. Season to taste and add 1 tablespoon grated onion. Shape into 4 patties. Wrap slices of partially cooked bacon around the patties and skewer with toothpicks. Wrap well in aluminum foil or transparent plastic wrap. Freeze.
To serve: Unwrap frozen patties and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for about 20 minutes. Then broil until the patties are hot and bacon is crisp.

KIDNEY STEW

Simmer 2 beef kidneys in 2½ cups boiling salted water for 20 minutes. Lift out kidneys and cool. Strain stock through cheesecloth. Cut the kidneys open, remove the tubes and fat and dice them. Make a brown roux of 3 tablespoons shortening and 3 tablespoons flour. Add kidney stock and cook until thickened. Season with 1 clove garlic, crushed, 1 large onion, chopped, 1 bay leaf, crushed, and a pinch each of salt, cayenne and thyme. Cover and simmer for 1 hour. Cool. Divide into 4 equal portions. Cover and freeze in individual containers.
To serve: Thaw enough to remove from containers. Heat in double boiler until steaming hot.

SHISH KEBABS

Cut 1 pound lean lamb into 1″ cubes. Arrange on long skewers alternately with cubes of pineapple and canned whole onions. Place on individual pieces of aluminum foil. Then make a marinade of ¼ cup vinegar, 1 tablespoon salad oil and ½ teaspoon meat tenderizer. Season with a pinch of marjoram, ¼ teaspoon garlic salt, a dash each of monosodium glutamate, salt and pepper, and ½ teaspoon soy sauce. Pour evenly over the kebabs on the foil. Wrap the meat with an airtight fold. Allow to stand at room temperature for 1 hour before freezing. Freeze.
To serve: Place frozen packages in a very hot oven, 450° F., for 10 minutes. Then open the foil and broil the meat until slightly browned.

MUSHROOM CASSEROLE

Sauté in a hot, lightly salted skillet 6 cups sliced fresh mushrooms. Cover while they cook. When barely tender, add ⅔ cup finely chopped onion and continue cooking until the onion is tender. Stir in 1 tablespoon flour and 1 can condensed consommé. Cook, stirring gently, until the sauce is thickened. Season with 1 teaspoon basil, ¼ teaspoon thyme, ¼ teaspoon rosemary and 4 drops of hot pepper sauce. Pour into 4 individual casseroles. Cool. Wrap in aluminum foil or transparent plastic wrap and freeze.
To serve: Thaw for 20 minutes at room temperature. Remove the covering from the casseroles. Place on a baking sheet and bake in a hot oven, 400° F., until the casseroles are bubbling.

FILLET OF SOLE

For each fillet of sole to be frozen, prepare a strip of aluminum foil large enough to cover fish and make an airtight wrap. Place the fillet on the foil. Sprinkle with salt and pepper. Add a little lemon juice, a dash of marjoram and thyme. Wrap securely and freeze.
To serve: Place frozen packages in a moderately hot oven, 375° F., for 20–25 minutes. If you would like your fish browned slightly, slit open the packages. Sprinkle a little paprika on the fish and run under the broiler until it is browned.

CHICKEN WITH VEGETABLES

Cook 8–10 small peeled white onions and 1 cup sliced carrots in 2 cups hot chicken broth for about 10 minutes. Drain, reserving broth. Mix 1 package thawed, frozen peas with the vegetables, along with 2 cups cooked chicken, cut into bite-size pieces. Season the broth with salt and pepper to taste. Blend 2 tablespoons nonfat dry skim milk with ¼ cup broth and add to rest of broth. Pour over the vegetables and chicken. Mix well. Cool. Place in 4 individual baking dishes. Cover and freeze.
To serve: Allow the dishes to stand at room temperature ½ hour. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for about 45 minutes.

PEACH SHERBET

Mix 2 tablespoons sugar with ¾ cup diced, thawed, frozen peaches. Heat until sugar is dissolved. Cool and add ¼ cup frozen orange-juice concentrate. Pour ¾ cup liquefied nonfat dry skim milk into a freezing tray and freeze until it is mushy around the edges. Pour into a cold bowl and beat until the consistency of whipped cream. Beat 1 egg white until frothy. Add 2 tablespoons sugar, gradually, beating well after each addition. Fold into whipped milk. Add peach mixture. Pour into 2 freezing trays and freeze until partially frozen. Beat again and return to freezing trays and continue freezing overnight. The next day, rebeat until the consistency of ice cream. Add ½ teaspoon almond extract. Pour into 2 pint containers. Cover and freeze until firm.

BEEF RAGOUT

Brown 1 pound of cubed lean chuck in a hot, lightly salted skillet. Add 2 large onions, peeled and sliced, and 1¼ cups water. Cover and simmer for 1 hour. Season with salt and pepper. Slightly cook ⅔ cup diced carrots and ½ cup sliced celery. Do not overcook at this point because they are to be cooked again. Drain. Add ¾ cup thawed frozen peas and allow to cool. Thicken beef with 1 tablespoon flour mixed with 2 tablespoons water. Add cooled vegetables. Divide into 4 equal portions. Cover and freeze.
To serve: Heat in the top of a double boiler until thawed and well heated.

TONGUE-AND-ARTICHOKE SALAD

Slice into thin strips ½ pound canned tongue. Cook 1 package frozen artichoke hearts according to package directions. Drain. Sprinkle with 1 tablespoon lemon juice. Cool. Add tongue. Divide into 4 individual containers. Cover and freeze.
To serve: Allow to stand at room temperature until able to separate. Serve on lettuce. For dressing, use fresh lemon juice.

TUNA SALAD

Mix 2 cans dietetic-pack tuna with 1 tablespoon lemon juice, 2 teaspoons grated onion and 4 sliced canned water chestnuts. Season with ½ teaspoon salt and a dash each of pepper, celery salt and monosodium glutamate, and 2 teaspoons grated onion. Cover and freeze in 4 individual containers.
To serve: Thaw. Add some diced green celery, sliced radishes, and serve on a lettuce leaf.

MIXED VEGETABLE SALAD

Add ⅓ cup water to ⅔ cup wine vinegar. Add 1 teaspoon curry powder, 1 clove garlic, crushed, and 1 small onion, cut into quarters. Let stand at room temperature for 1 hour. Meanwhile cook separately, according to directions on the package, ¾ cup each of frozen cut green beans, wax beans and peas. Cook ¾ cup sliced carrots in salted water until tender. Drain and place in a bowl. Remove onion and garlic from the dressing. Pour over vegetables. Let marinate until vegetables are cool. Place in 4 half-pint freezing containers. Cover and freeze.
To serve: Allow to stand at room temperature for ½ hour. Arrange on lettuce leaves.

SHRIMP CREOLE

Brown ½ cup finely diced onion and 1 clove garlic, crushed, in 1 tablespoon salad oil. Add 1 lb. shelled and cleaned shrimp and sauté for a few minutes. Add 1 cup tomato sauce and 2 fresh tomatoes, cut into small pieces. Season with ½ teaspoon salt and a dash each of pepper, orégano, basil and

"How I use Murine to rest my eyes"

PATRICIA NELSON

United Air Lines Stewardess

"I do this often to rest and refresh my eyes. And for the comfort of United's Mainliner passengers, we keep Murine in our stewardess kits, too." Miss Nelson's idea is worth copying. Rest and refresh your eyes with a couple of drops of gentle Murine any time they feel the least bit tired or irritated. It's such a pleasant way to be good to your eyes!

cayenne. Simmer, covered, for 15 minutes. Remove from heat. Cool. Freeze, covered, in 4 individual containers.

To serve: Thaw just enough to remove from the containers. Place in the double boiler and heat through.

CEREAL LACE WAFERS

Sift together ½ cup cake flour, ¼ teaspoon baking powder and ⅛ teaspoon baking soda. Mix ¼ cup molasses, ¼ cup butter and ¼ cup sugar in a saucepan. Bring to a rolling boil and boil for 1 minute. Remove from heat. Add sifted dry ingredients and ½ cup crispy rice cereal. Mix well. Drop by ¼ teaspoons on a greased baking sheet, 4" apart. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., 7–9 minutes. Makes 5 dozen cookies. Wrap in aluminum foil or transparent plastic film packages of six. Freeze.

VEGETABLE SOUP

Partially cook ½ package each of frozen peas and wax beans. Cook 1 cup diced carrots only until barely tender. Drain and add to the liquids ½ can chicken broth and 1 medium onion, sliced. Cook until the onion is tender. Cool. Add the vegetables. Divide into 4 containers, cover and freeze.

To serve: Heat in the top of a double boiler until steaming.

READY, SET, REDUCE!

Shop for all the foods you will need the day before you plan to start preparing and freezing them, so that on the first "big day" you can get off to a really fresh—and early—start. You'll find it's easiest, and most efficient, to make up the entire diet before you start eating it. It may seem like a big order, but we've divided the work into two days so there will be time for essential household duties and for an occasional rest period for yourself!

On the First Day

Simmer the broth for the scallops and put the green peppers (for the stuffed green peppers) on to poach. Set them aside to cool and prepare the filling for the peppers. This, too, should cool before putting it into the pepper shells. Next mix up the spongecake and put it in to bake. The liver patties can be made while the cake is baking and, also, the kidneys for the kidney stew can be poached. While the liver patties are cooking, finish the kidney stew and set it aside to cool. Thread the shish kebabs and wrap so they will marinate an hour before going into the freezer. Prepare the mushroom casserole, and while it is cooking wrap up the fillet of sole and all the other things that have been cooking. Pop all these in the freezer marked with the name of the dish and its calorie count. If you would like, you can steam your chicken and have it ready to go all cooled in the morning.

On the Second Day:

Start with the peach sherbet because it will be worked with at various times all day. When it is in the freezer for the first time, put together the chicken-with-vegetable dish. Set it aside to cool and do the beef ragout. This, too, must cool, so the next step is to cook the artichokes for the tongue-and-artichoke salad. While they are cooking, slice the tongue and that is ready to go. Follow this with the tuna salad and the mixed vegetable salad, and then do the shrimp creole. While this is cooking, bake the cookies and prepare the vegetable soup. Wrap everything at one time. Again, mark it and all is ready for the diet.

HANK AND JULIE AND DYLAN THOMAS

She went away, and Hank Woodridge went into the cellar and stoked the furnace.

The next night, though, with borrowed skates, he went around to the dean's front door and rang the bell. Julie came herself, stood scowling at him. "I thought you might like to go skating," he said.

"Well, I wouldn't."

"Oh, come now! I don't have many nights off—there's a moon."

"Sometimes I could kill you. Actually," she said. "Wait a minute."

She came downstairs in the plaid skirt, carrying skates.

"You see, you ought to let the man be the aggressor," he said with mock patience. "Men pursue."

"Some do and some don't," she said crossly. "Why didn't you come to dinner Thursday when mother asked you?"

"I don't know. Let's leave it that I don't like to be obligated."

"How snobbish you are about poverty! Did you ever stop to think that mother just might like you? She thinks you're a 'personable young man.' You are, you know."

"See, there you go again. Don't say things like that to me. It's forward."

The moon made a silver path on the black lake and all around the edges the snow lay deep. The two joined hands and swept onto the ice, moving freely as birds in soundless rhythm.

After a long wordless time, she said, "Isn't it better than Dylan Thomas?"

He gave a chuckle and said, "Ah, but it is Dylan! He's all for living, you know, honey."

"Don't call me 'honey.' It's insulting, from you. And I'd already mentioned living to you. You're the one who doesn't listen."

He whirled her around and said, "Dylan had his demijohn—I have you!"

She couldn't help laughing, though it made her angry to do so. "Thanks," she said. "Hank, you're not really going to be a poet, are you?"

"On the side—on the side, I might. Everybody ought to be a poet or a painter or something on the side. As you said, I'm a mathematician. But between classes, in the summer vacations—though I expect I'll have to teach in summer school to make both ends meet—well, in the chinks, I'll write poetry. Makes me feel like a king!"

"Oh, you feel like a king anyway. Never was any human being so condescending."

"Well, one has to take you down a little. You'd be intolerable without a little discipline. You're just too used to having your own way."

"All right. Skip it. It's that complex you've got, because you're poor. Silly, but that's the way you are. What's so special about being poor? Makes a man ambitious and all that."

His laughing face grew sober. "The truth is, Julie, that I am poor. You can't imagine what it's like to be really poor. And yet I have Dylan—he makes me feel like a king. As if I could lift the world on my shoulders and never feel it. As if I could laugh and love and never mind an empty pocket or cooking hamburgers on a gas plate night after night."

"Love?" She picked the word softly out of his sentences as if it had stood alone.

"M-h'm—that lovely fleeting emotion called 'love.'"

"Oh. Just anyone?"

"No. I'm choosy."

"Why fleeting? Sometimes it lasts."

"How would you know, honey? How many times have you been in love already? Dozens, I expect. It's fleeting, all right, but so lovely while it lasts."

"How many times have you?"

"Oh, a number, a number. I haven't been giving my mind to it lately, though. Lots of snow to shovel—marks—all that. But Dylan has warned me time is passing. So, here we are, flying in the moonlight ——"

"You don't mean you've chosen me for your fling?"

"No, I just thought I might practice on you—you're always so available!"

"And after me?" Julie said at last.

"Who knows? I'll have to wait and see. I'll know when the right time comes. Meanwhile, you'll have to do."

"Let's go home. I'm cold."

"Cold? With me?"

"Yes, always with you. You send off sparks, Hank, but you don't warm anything. And what will you do, Hank, if you find it isn't fleeting? If you get stuck with your fling? It happens, you know. And suppose she doesn't get stuck but fleets away? I wish it would happen that way and then you'd be cold yourself. Cold and lonely and sick."

"I've been that often enough, Julie. Don't hex me now. You're handy with words yourself. You don't actually know anything about being cold and lonely, any more than you know about love. You overdramatize your emotions—you always have."

"All right. I don't feel like playing any more. Take me home."

"As you wish." But he whirled around and faced her, holding her arms tight. Then he leaned and kissed her squarely on the mouth.

She let him kiss her, did not pull away, but when he straightened, she said, "I really hate you, Hank."

"So? Then leave me alone," he said.

They skated to the bench, took their skates off, went silently up the slope and to the house. He said, "Good night, Julie." She shut the door firmly in his face. He went slowly around to the back and into his own room.

Two days went by and she was back again, coming this time by the cellar door.

"You wouldn't want to give me a hand with trig, would you?" she asked.

"Not especially. What's bothering you?"

"Everything. It doesn't get through to me, trig doesn't."

"Well, where is it? Sit down and show me what you want." He shoved his own books back, made a place for her.

She sat around the corner of the card table from him, opened her book. "I can learn formulae, but when it comes to applying them to something real, I can't," she said.

He began to explain, very clearly and coolly, what she was to do, then said, "Now you do it."

She began to work and suddenly she gave him a bright smile. "It works! You're wonderful, Hank. In your way," she added with a drop of enthusiasm.

He went on methodically, impersonally, till Julie's homework was done.

She shut the book, said, "We have that room at the back, looking toward the lake. No one's in it—mother says, 'Why don't we ask Hank to live up there? It would be so much more comfortable for the boy.' So you might as well. Be just like one of the family."

"And leave this snug little haven? No, thanks. This is my sanctuary; cool in summer and warm in winter, as mamma pig said—or was it the third pig said it? . . . I don't want to be part of the family. I've got a family."

"I know. Poor, proud people. But they ought to have brought you up politer. I suppose, slaving from dawn to dark, they didn't have time."

"They had time enough. If I wanted to write poetry, they wouldn't interrupt me. Very knowledgeable about some things, my parents. And if I had trig to do, they'd expect me to work it out for myself. They'd expect they'd given me that kind of persistence."

"Oh, as a matter of fact, I could have done it myself. Every so often I find I have to check up to see if you're really as incredibly rude and cruel as I thought you were. You always are."

"You're very pretty, Julie. But don't trade on it. Age comes on and makes lines. You need something solider then."

"You do think I'm pretty, then? Now don't say anything about my always getting back to the personal note. . . . If you think I'm pretty, why am I so obnoxious to you?"

"Why, I don't think much about pretty and not pretty—I like my girls full of character. No, life was all I meant."

"I'm alive."

"Are you, honey? . . . Look, Julie, let's not quarrel—let's not be clever tonight. I don't feel up to it. You see, it happens to be true that I don't have time for games, for loving and all that. I'm here on the slimmest margin. I have to get through and get to work. But I have emotions—I'm not cold. You don't need to hate me."

"I don't hate you—much," Julie said. "I just want you to be human once in a while. You talk a lot about life—but do you live much yourself?"

"Yes, I live, in a way. You've always had enough—your folks aren't rich, but neither are they poor. There was never any question but what you would go to college if you wanted to. You don't even want college very much. Well, I wanted it and my folks wanted it for me and they do slave from dawn to dark to keep me here. My mother's very little, your size. It wouldn't seem important to you that I had to sit up almost all night after skating the other night to get my work done. But I did."

"You take time out for poetry," she said stubbornly.

"Yes. That I do. But I have to pay for it. You have to create something or die. Now, will you run along, Julie? I like you all right, but I haven't time."

She stood up. "Sometimes I paint a picture," she said anxiously. "Would that count?"

He rose, went to her, kissed her, said, "Was that what you wanted?"

She rubbed her mouth. "No," she said in a lost young voice. "That wasn't what I wanted, Hank. That wasn't it, at all." She went slowly toward the door.

Then there was a thaw and the skating was gone. Julie let a good many days go by without once going down to the back room. Then walking home from a class she met him.

"Hi," he said, no more.

"Hi," she answered.

He seemed to be going by, but suddenly he stopped and said, "You look wan. Are you taking your vitamins?"

"There aren't any vitamins for my deficiencies," she said.

"Well, for goodness' sake, take something. You weren't meant to be the ethereal type."

"I shall be whatever type I like. So long, Hank."

So he went on to class and she went home. On the hall table in the dean's house the mail lay in a small pile. Julie found a letter for Hank, from home. She knew his mother's writing very well now, a square, angry sort of writing. She didn't take it to him then. He wouldn't be home till five after eleven.

Julie went up to her room, got out her paints and began to paint, very badly, a view of the lake.

When it was six minutes past eleven, she took the letter and went down the steps to the little room at the back. Hank had just come in. He had dumped his books on the table and was just standing there.

"You got a letter," Julie said.

"Oh? Good." He reached out his hand for the letter and opened it without apology, began to read it. Something changed in his face as he read. Lines seemed to grow in an instant in his appealing face.

He read the letter clear to the end, then looked around the little room in the strangest way.

"What's the matter? Is it bad news?" Julie asked.

"My father's had a stroke," he said dully.

"Oh, Hank!"

"I have to go home," he said. "Now. As soon as I can get a train."

"Not leave college?"

"Yes, for now. Why didn't she wire me?"

"Hank, you can't go home, not for good," Julie said. "Somehow you can manage the money. You can't quit. . . . Father'd lend it to you ——"

"I'm not quitting. I'll be back one of these days. But with father not working, there's nothing." He had walked to the small closet, taken out two suitcases. He opened the drawers in the pine dresser, began to put things quickly, untidily, into the suitcases. "Call up about the train, will you?"

She ran out and up the stairs, came down soon. "Two-ten," she said.

"Could you manage to send my books express, if I get them packed?"

"Yes, I'll send them. Don't mess up your shirts that way!" She began to straighten the shirts, the socks, efficiently, silently.

"Buzz Gleason would be glad of the room. He's very good at hedges. Would you explain to your folks?"

In such a little time Hank's things were packed, his books were ready in a cardboard container, all wrapped and tied and addressed.

"You'll have to have some lunch," Julie said.

"There are two hamburgers left," he said.

She put the little frying pan on the gas plate. "Get some bread out," she said.

She made two sandwiches, got the milk and poured two glasses full.

"All right, eat," she said. "It's such a waste."

"No, it's not a waste. I'll be back."

There were no clever remarks, nothing, as they ate the sandwiches, drank the milk. Julie washed the dishes carefully, put them away.

"I'll drive you to the station," she said then.

"Would you? Thanks."

Then he turned to her, his nice face bereft, bewildered. He reached out and pulled her into his arms. "Oh, Julie! Darling Julie! There isn't any time!" he said, his face tight to hers, his hand on her hair. "Don't cry, darling—don't cry—I can't bear it."

"You will come back? You promise?"

"I promise. I'll come back. It might not be next fall—it might be the fall after that. But I'll come. Oh, Julie, Julie!"

"It's all right, Hank. I'll be here. Oh, Hank, I love you so! Not the fleeting way, Hank. I just love you."

"And I you. All the time I have, Julie. I thought there was more time."

Then he just held her and she clung to him and they were silent, loving, being loved.

"We have to go," she said. "I'll get the car."

They drove to the station. Trees were dripping in a melancholy way. They stood there on the platform in the wet. They had always talked so quickly, but they had no words now. Then the train was coming in, hot beside them. He looked at her, she looked at him. "All a . . . board!" came the cry.

They didn't even say good-by. "I'll be here," was all she said. He swung onto the train and then she saw his face at the window, looking at her without mockery, with love and sorrow. The train began to move.

"But I don't see why he couldn't at least have said good-by," the dean's wife said.

"He didn't have time," Julie said. "Buzz Gleason will be glad to have the room."

"But just to say good-by," her mother protested. "Surely he could have done that. . . . It's such a pity, when he's so brilliant and all. Couldn't he have managed somehow?"

"But he'll be back," Julie said. "He'll be back next year, or maybe the year after that. He just has to see his people through this trouble, that's all."

She went slowly up the stairs to her room, looked at her picture with some distaste. With one foot on Snowdon and one on Tregaron. . . . "I didn't even find the right mountain for him," she said. "He's the giant, not Dylan Thomas—only maybe they both are." She began to work on the picture. Tears ran down her face and she brushed them off impatiently, worked steadily, earnestly, trying to create something to fill in the chinks of time till he should be back.

broth and ■ quarter cup of soy sauce. Season with two and a half teaspoons salt, two teaspoons monosodium glutamate, a teaspoon of sugar and a teaspoon of pepper. Cover. Steam about five minutes. Blend two tablespoons cornstarch with a small amount of water. Add to chicken and cook just enough to make the broth thick and transparent. Sauté about a cup of walnut halves in a little butter until crisp and golden. Drain. Serve the chicken, sprinkled with walnuts, accompanied by cooked rice. Makes six servings.

As for our salad, we need "the cooling sanity of lettuce, and every other herbal green—whose touch is calm, whose heart is clean." Our variety of greens becomes a crisp cluster for the pineapple chunks—fresh (or frozen or canned), dusted lightly with paprika—and generous slices of smooth green avocado. French dressing, with a hint of rosemary and a suggestion of exotic curry, adds the final touch.

SALAD DRESSING

Mix together in a jar two thirds cup salad oil, one tablespoon each of vinegar, lemon juice and orange juice. Season with a half teaspoon of sugar, salt and pepper to taste, a dash of rosemary and just a suggestion of curry powder. Shake vigorously and toss with salad greens just before serving.

The fennel croissants, so subtly aromatic, light and tender, served hot, are irresistible even to the diet-conscious.

CROISSANTS WITH FENNEL

Soften a package of yeast, compressed or dry, in a quarter cup of lukewarm water. In a large bowl mix together five tablespoons sugar, a teaspoon of salt and a teaspoon of ground fennel seed. Then add a quarter cup of shortening and three quarters cup of hot milk. Stir till shortening is melted. Add one and one half cups flour to make a thick batter. Beat until smooth and allow to stand until lukewarm. Add softened yeast and two well-beaten eggs. Then stir in one and one half cups sifted flour. Place dough in a large greased bowl. The dough is quite soft. Cover and let rise in a warm place for about one and one half hours or until doubled in bulk. To tell when dough is doubled, press two fingers gently into the dough. If it holds the indentation and doesn't spring back, it's ready for shaping. Punch dough down and turn out on well-floured board. After punching down dough, you may place it in a bowl, cover and refrigerate overnight. Next day, punch dough down again and proceed as follows. Divide dough into three equal portions. Cover and let rest about ten minutes. Roll each piece of dough into a nine-inch circle. Mix one beaten egg and a little melted butter. Brush lightly on each circle. Cut into eight pie-shaped wedges. Roll each wedge tightly, beginning at wide end. Seal point firmly. Place on greased baking sheets. Brush with egg and butter and sprinkle with poppy seeds. Cover. Let rise in warm place until double in bulk, about fifteen to twenty minutes. Brush again with egg and butter. Bake in a hot oven, 400° F., about fifteen minutes.

A sweet dessert after the pineapple salad and hearty casserole would be too much, so we wind up our dinner with a variety of good cheeses. We chose some Cheddar, Edam, Swiss, Bleu and Roquefort, and some spiced cheeses. The cracker counter of any store also offers many, many varieties and shapes. Pick a generous grouping of Melbas, saltines, flavored crackers and toasted wafers. A rule of cheese serving everyone should know: allow the cheeses to stand at room temperature for a while before serving. Flavors are mellowed, the cheeses are spreadable and irresistible. Have plenty of cheese knives handy.

FORTUNE COOKIES

Beat one egg slightly. Gradually add one third cup sugar, beating until mixture is very thick. Add two tablespoons water, a little at a time, beating until thick and light. With a spoon, fold in a half cup cake flour until just blended. Don't beat, treat it gently. Grease a baking sheet and dust lightly with flour. Slowly drop by teaspoons onto the sheet, spreading each cooky with a spatula until it is a three-inch circle. Since the spreading takes up much of the sheet, bake only two cookies at a time. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for ten minutes. Loosen from the baking sheet immediately. Pinch opposite sides together—knapsack style. If the cookies become too crisp to shape, put them back in the oven for a few minutes. They'll soften up perfectly. Before serving, slip in the fortunes (the more ridiculous, the more fun, we think) written on small pieces of paper. You'll have about twelve cookies.

Usually we save the hot beverage for the end of the meal. The Chinese, though, serve tea throughout. For an authentic twist, try serving clear piping-hot tea all during dinner. Your own teacups will be fine if the Chinese ones without handles are not available. In the Orient, sugar and cream are considered an insult to tea, but you'd better serve them, or at least have them on hand in case your guests want them. END

"...and we'll have plenty of phones!"

He: Hey, kind of extravagant, aren't you?

She: Not at all—convenient phones make life so much easier—save time and so many steps.

He: But what do they cost?

She: Very little—so let's have them in color. One for the kitchen, den and bedroom. Sound nice?

He: Sure does—but how much?

She: Just a little more each month than the cost of one phone alone . . . and it will give us the convenient service we want.

He: Great—then let's put a phone in the basement, too!

Mark Shaw

You may have noticed that the couple on our cover met on their way to church last November, skied together in January, and by March were looking pretty misty-eyed at each other under an umbrella. The man behind this series of story covers is Mark Shaw. A native New Yorker who started out in industrial design and then got fascinated by photography, Mr. Shaw has done numerous cover and fashion pages for magazines—with time off during the war to fly a fighter plane and execute several harrowing escapes from crashing and/or burning planes. He and his wife (who writes feature articles and mysteries under the name Geri Trotta) live in New York with a marshmallow-colored cat named Spooky—and a Cessna 310, which enables them to fly to Montreal for weekends, Cuba for vacations, and (occasionally) Boston for luncheon!

R. Prawer Jhabvala

It may surprise some readers of the lighthearted and thoroughly Indian novel, A Prince for Nimmi, to learn that R. Prawer Jhabvala (R for Ruth) was born in Germany and educated in England. In 1951 she married C. S. H. Jhabvala, a Parsi architect, and six years later she writes, "I cannot imagine myself ever living—or ever having lived—anywhere but Delhi." She explains that she can't tell us much about her life in India because "it seems to have been spent mostly in having babies and writing novels!" The first of these, Amrita, was published last year; the second we offer on p. 66; the third you will have to wait for—it is still being written.

Frank Farnham

When FRANK FARNHAM sold the JOURNAL his very first story (Tiger in the Bedroom, published September, 1956) he wrote us that, up to that time, his writing had resulted in only one major triumph—the saving of five lives. "Only the eldest of my three children clearly remembers running barefoot through the snow in a January gale, after my wife and I had got them down flaming stairs to safety. If, at two that morning, I had not been up writing and awake to give the alarm . . ." We're certainly glad Mr. Farnham was up writing that night, and although we regret the fire we are proud to publish the story based on it: The Mountain That Fell at the Falls, p. 68. Mr. Farnham, who lives with his wife and children on a farm in Belgrade, Maine, says he writes hard all winter long, because "when planting time comes, I have to stop writing." Dawn, Duane (or Tigger) and Lynn (or Piglet) evidently take their father's writing casually; when Lynn learned her father's story would be in the JOURNAL she said sadly, "There's one magazine you won't let me cut up!"

Drinking Question

Washington, D.C.

Dear Editors: Although I have stopped reading several other magazines, I have continued to buy the JOURNAL because you do not advertise alcoholic beverages. Now, I am surprised and angry to see, you have begun a new serial in which drinking is apparently the accepted thing to do. Is this necessary? Everyone knows that drinking is one of the worst evils today, and you are not helping us keep our children from going down the road to alcoholism and ruin.

I hope I will not see any more stories of this kind in your magazine.

Very truly yours,
MRS. JAMES S. FRANKLIN

▶ In refusing liquor ads, the JOURNAL voluntarily gives up annually a potential million dollars in advertising revenue accepted by many reputable magazines. We do this because we think a family magazine for women should not solicit its readers, in advertisements, to drink either beer, wine or hard liquor. At the same time, however, we realize that many of our readers do enjoy drinking, and that lots of people drink. When our stories contain scenes of normal people drinking, it is because our stories are about life as it is lived in this country or abroad. ED.

Who Dunnit!

Cleveland, Ohio

Sir: "Never underestimate the power of a woman." I discovered the truth of this statement at the library one day; for in the middle of a mystery novel I picked from the shelf, I found the following note:

Bill,
When you have read this far, please turn off the beef stew.
Love,
Helen

Sincerely yours,

How America Lives

La Junta, Colorado

Dear Sir: You really scraped the bottom of the barrel when you printed "Demonstrated Ability" in your February issue.

I feel I am a Christian, but if fostering this movement for integration and annihilating the white race is Christianity then I am beginning to have my doubts. In case the Negroes are not satisfied with the setup in this country why don't they return to their native land and live with their uncles, aunts and cousins who are head-hunters and savages? After all, this country was settled by white people. Left to themselves, the Negroes would revert back to savages.

I realize this is not the kind of letter you like to print in Our Readers Write Us, but there are still some people left who would like to see a letter like this printed.

Sincerely,
MRS. D. A. HOLLOWELL

▶ In our How America Lives series, we show how a cross section of American families live. The James family was a fine example; and the majority of readers who wrote us about this story of an Air Force family agree. ED.

New Friend for Blind Children of China

New York, New York

Dear Miss Brookman: One day soon the blind children of China will reach out and touch a new friend. Their tense little features will soften into smiles and they will chatter happily because, unlike the others, this one speaks Chinese as they do.

That's how it's going to be when Wai Chit Tam goes home. It's been eleven years since she left Hong Kong and her family. She has traveled more than 15,000 miles, has studied at London and Columbia Universities, and has decided irrevocably that her future will be devoted to the blind children of her homeland.

Miss Tam's childhood dream was to come to America; and in 1946, after graduating from Hong Kong University, she came to New York by way of Europe. In 1955, she had just enough money to return to Hong Kong, but she saw a brochure about blind children. She attended lectures on the problems of educating handicapped children, and came to The Lighthouse in New York to apply for a job. The children took to her at once, and Miss Tam says: "The emotional problems, of course, are greater and there are more accident risks. But the feeling that you're helping a blind boy or girl fit into society compensates for all the extra concern."

Miss Tam and cowboy.

Those of us who have worked with Wai Chit Tam have seen her overcome the dark with patience and understanding. And there are thousands of Chinese children who will benefit from the knowledge she has attained here.

Very sincerely,
GILBERT COSTA

Camping Guide for Parents

Bradford Woods
Martinsville, Indiana

Dear Editor: "This camp has been approved for membership in the American Camping Association."

What does this mean to parents?

It means that the camp has been visited by members of the Standards Committee and is qualified in all areas: Personnel, Program, Campsite and Facilities, Administration, Health, Sanitation and Safety.

For the first time in camping history, parents may find a list of approved resident camps in the new Directory of the American Camping Association. Eventually, Day Camps, Travel and Family Camps will also be listed—a gigantic task, but one that will result in better camping for America's children.

Sincerely yours,
THEODORE CAVINS

That's when most deodorants fail...but new MUM Cream keeps working

You've probably noticed . . . when you're under emotional pressure, your perspiration glands suddenly get more active. That's when deodorants which depend on stopping perspiration let you down, and odor often starts.

New Mum® Cream works a completely different way. It is the only leading deodorant that works entirely by stopping odor. Mum keeps on working actively to stop odor 24 hours a day—no matter how active your perspiration glands are.

No wonder Mum is so dependable. Isn't that what you want?

More people depend on MUM

Another shortening was used to fry this chicken. Looks good, too, but see the chicken on the right!

Golden Fluffo fried this chicken. Never before could you get this appetizing, all-over golden browning.

Something Golden Happens

(Only Fluffo, of all leading shortenings, gives this golden-crisping action.)

You can see it happen the instant the chicken hits the skillet. You know you're going to get more eye-filling, appetizing results than you could get from any other leading shortening.

No other leading shortening gives you such crisp, light, golden-brown fried foods. Everything fried right and light in Fluffo is beautifully browned all over—and just as digestible as it looks.

No other kind of shortening gives you such tender, flaky, golden-brown pies. No change in the measurement your favorite recipe calls for—just a wonderful change in results!

Fluffo even handles differently; it's so much lighter and fluffier it's a joy to use. Blends with fewer, easier strokes, and the golden color lets you see how perfectly you're mixing cake batter or pie dough. Try golden Fluffo—how can you possibly miss?

AMERICAN EDUCATION HAS MANY MERITS

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

PHILADELPHIA MUSEUM OF ART

VILLE D' AVRAY: THE POND WITH A BOATMAN, etching by Jean Baptiste Camille Corot
(French School, 1796–1875).
Size, 2⅞" x 4¾".

In the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL I have written frequently and critically of some aspects of American primary and high-school education. My complaints have largely been that it is too soft in discipline and too easy in subject matter; that it fails to give the child a thorough training in elementary skills; that our high schools conspicuously neglect mathematics, physics and the natural sciences; that for the gifted child or youth there is too little to attract his industry and develop to their fullest his innate talents; and—as I was, I think, the first to emphasize after a trip in 1956 to the Soviet Union—we are lagging behind the Russians in producing an adequate number of technicians and engineers.

Although I have not altered my opinion about these things, it is refreshing to record some of the great advantages of American education, as it appears in contrast to other forms of education in other countries, where education and the attitude toward its purpose have been modeled on the continental European.

For four months during the last winter—from mid-November to mid-March—I traveled through the countries of the Middle East. Although the primary purpose of my visit was to study the political situation of these countries in a much-disturbed area of the world, highlighted by the international crisis over Suez, I did manage to pay some attention to social and educational developments. And I found that in every single country there is also a "crisis in education," though of a very different kind from our own. One might say that in these new countries—old in history, but new in adapting themselves to this century—the problems of education arise not from too much experimentation along untried, or only briefly tried, paths, but from an ossification that fails to meet the demands—and, indeed, necessities—of an evolving society.

Everywhere, in the countries I visited (and quite regardless of their political troubles), Education (with a very big capital letter) is the concern of governments and peoples alike, down to the last illiterate villager living in a mud hut. In most of these countries even primary education is still at an early or middle stage. In very few of them is every child in elementary school. None of them can offer a secondary education to all who desire it. But in all of them the desire for education outweighs every other social striving. The last illiterate peasant wants his child to go to school, confident that only through education can his children and their children after them hope to lead a better, fuller life than he and all his ancestors before him could hope for, or have even dreamed of.

News of other countries, of lands where every child can learn to read and write and figure, has permeated places and peoples who a generation ago knew of nothing beyond a few miles around their villages. For although many can neither read nor write, they can hear, and although few own a private radio, there is always one in the village tavern or the market place, telling through an amplifier facts and views from all the world.

The efforts and sacrifices people will make to get their children to the only available school, however remote, is deeply moving. Children will walk for miles to and from school, as they did in America in pioneer (and even much later) days. Or they will be brought, or come alone, on horseback or camel.

But in the ministries of education, there is a universal realization that education, as it has been practiced in secondary schools and universities for generations back, falls far short of what their societies need.

In all these countries (with one exception) there has always been an educated class. The sons of rich landholders or merchants, the children of pashas and effendis, have been educated for generations, either at home, in the few schools existing, or by tutors, or abroad in Europe, almost always on the continent. One need only meet any delegate to the United Nations, or any attaché of an embassy in Washington, to realize that they are not lacking in a highly refined education.

But education has, with a few exceptions confined to the more advanced Middle Eastern nations, been available only to the relatively small upper echelons of society. Like their social, property and financial condition, it has been a badge of status, setting them apart from the people. It has helped them to maintain and enhance that status. The idea that it might be used to lift the status of everybody is a brand-new concept, not always well received by themselves or by national governments.

Nobody should be blamed for this. Long-ingrained habits and attitudes are very hard to change. It is rather remarkable to observe the extent to which they are changing.

Many factors contribute to this, the most important being, I think, industrialization. Modern industries cannot use illiterates, except for the most primitive and menial tasks. They require many grades of labor, from ditchdigger to the more skilled, the trained mechanic, the highly competent technician, right up to the managerial level—for all countries, now dependent to a great extent upon foreigners for managerial capacities, hope, and rightly so, to be able sooner or later to man and manage their own industries at every level.

The new look at agriculture as a science requires similar approaches and skills. The development of clinical medicine, public-health centers and preventive health programs, which one finds everywhere, makes the same demands. Every country needs not only more doctors but doctors with a different, more social outlook, trained to co-operate with other doctors. They need laboratory technicians, nurses, social workers, as well as mechanics, industrial CONTINUED ON PAGE 18

Entertaining ideas for May

by Betty Crocker

In the merry month of May—let's have a party! A May Day party for the Queen and all her court—with fresh-cut flowers and gaily colored streamers. Serve sparkling bowls of punch . . . and the keynote? A merry Maypole Cake, of course, like the one in our picture. Doesn't it just look like spring?

May 12 is Mother's Day. And our Confetti Party Loaf is one of the prettiest cakes we've seen to say, "I love you." Trouble? Not at all, with our Confetti Angel Food Mix. Those gay bits of candy are right in the mix — along with the whites of 13 farm-fresh eggs.

Your turn to entertain the club? At a busy time like this, what could be nicer than a cake 'n coffee break? Our Two-Tone Marble Cake is something a bit different. Your friends are sure to like it, and they'll never believe it's so easy!

Party cakes are fun year round—and when you use our guaranteed-perfect mixes, you know every cake you bake will be high and light and melt-in-your-mouth-tender. For we start with real home recipes and use the same ingredients you'd use yourself — Softasilk Cake Flour, high-quality shortening, the finest flavoring. Don't wait! Pick a cake this minute —and plan a party!

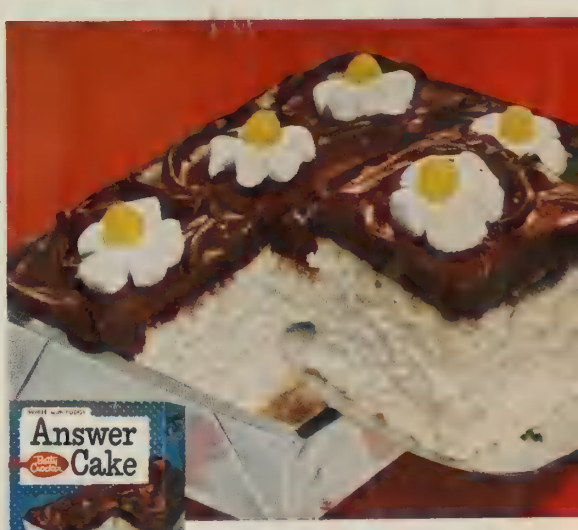
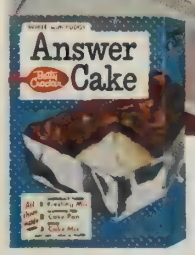
* PERFECT! Yes, all our Betty Crocker Mixes—Cake, Frosting, Brownie, Date Bar, Pie Crust, Answer Cake—are guaranteed to come out perfect, or send the box top to Betty Crocker, Box 200, Minneapolis, Minn., and General Mills will send your money back.





Banana Cream Gingerbread. Top squares of just-baked gingerbread with prepared vanilla pudding and sliced bananas. Ginger-good 'n easy! Just add water to our Betty Crocker Gingerbread Mix. Delicious!

Confetti Party Loaf. Bake Confetti Angel Food in two 9 x 5 x 2½" loaf pans 25 to 30 min. at 375° (350° for glass pans). Invert to cool. Cut wedge from top; fill with tinted whipped cream. Replace the wedge.

Betty Crocker Answer Cake. White Cake Mix, Chocolate Fudge Frosting Mix, baking pan—all in 1 box! Snip marshmallow halves for daisies. Add gumdrop centers.

Cake Cones. Use cupcake recipe on Betty Crocker Chocolate Devils Food Cake Mix package, filling flat-bottomed cones a scant ½ full. Cool; frost with our Betty Crocker Fluffy White Frosting. Add candies.

Two-Tone Cake. Pour ½ Betty Crocker Marble Cake plain batter into pan. Blend marbling mix into rest of batter. Pour into 2nd pan. Cool; split layers. Frost with whipped cream. Such a nice party dessert!

New! Li'l Angel Cake Mix. Makes one loaf (directions on package). Brush slices with butter; brown both sides under broiler. Top with jam and whipped cream.

technicians and managers. The agricultural areas need personnel trained to do something of the work of our county agents and soil-conservation directors, not only those who sit in bureaus, making plans, but those who work with farmers at the dirt level.

The educational system that has produced in some countries thousands of university graduates who, in theory and book knowledge, can outshine many of our own has not produced many men for these tasks. They are an educational aristocracy, unwilling to dirty their hands, not dreaming of a world in which one can begin as a mechanic and work oneself up to a managerial or executive position.

Most of them are not rich, though they may come from well-known families. Their parents have made enormous sacrifices to get them through a national university or send them to Europe to study. But what is there for them to do, their education and outlook on life being what it is?

Although educated people are sorely needed in the provinces, they head for the national capital to wangle a job in one of the ministries, often through family connections, other pulls, and sometimes, I fear, through money. I am not "telling tales out of school," but reporting what I heard over and over again from responsible national leaders.

They become civil servants, concerned with paper work, often of the most boring kind, and are universally poorly paid. They know a lot theoretically but have little chance or even desire to apply their knowledge.

Abraham Lincoln was once asked to give his definition of diplomacy. "Well," he mused, "I guess you might say that it's the knack of letting the other fellow have your way."

"They can instruct, by book, because they have been instructed rather than educated," a minister of education explained. Said an American Point Four leader, "They can lecture to peasants about what they should do, but unlike our county agents they won't go out and work with a farmer, do what needs to be done, in front of his eyes. Nor can they talk to farmers on their own level."

"We can train the people of this country to do almost any level of work," said the manager of an oil company in another country. "It is amazing. Young men who have never seen a machine, or heard of a bathtub, learn in a phenomenally short time to be expert mechanics, master plumbers—anything you like."

"Don't you have any difficulties?" I asked.

"One," he replied with a rather exasperated laugh. "To get them to clean up after themselves! They think that is work for a coolie. We have some operations performed in a small space, where oil-soaked rags and rubbish constitute a fire hazard. We have to work and work on the simple idea that they should leave everything as immaculate as they found it."

"Have you made any headway?"

"Oh, sure," he said. "I've gone in and cleaned up, myself, in front of their eyes. They know I am in a top-level salary bracket. Maybe they think I'm crazy, but it impresses them."

Many students go abroad to study, on their families' means or on scholarships. Many more would come to this country if American education—and transportation to and from America—were not much more expensive than European.

"I wish many more of our students could study in America," the Shah of Iran told me. "Because in America they learn to work."

"I think our education is rather easier than the European," I demurred.

How to have Beautiful Skin

now—and the rest of your life!

When you are young and your complexion is soft and dewy-fresh—as it ought to be—the male is drawn to it as irresistibly as you are to the velvet skin of a baby.

When you grow older, a smooth, clear, radiant skin is all the more important—to keep you looking young and alluring and to help you hold the man you love.

You can have a lovelier skin right now—and the rest of your life. The secret: wash it properly at least twice a day with Cuticura Soap. Here's why:

Cuticura Soap is the mildest, least drying, least irritating of all leading soaps by actual laboratory test. Uniquely superemollient, it helps maintain the natural moisture and normal, healthy acidity of the skin. Mildly medicated, it protects and preserves.

Blackheads, externally caused pimples, oily shine or flaky dryness call for Cuticura Ointment—along with Cuticura Soap—to soften and gently stimulate as it helps relieve.

In just 7 days you'll begin to see unbelievable new softness, freshness and radiance. Get Cuticura Soap and Ointment at your druggists.

New Way To Wash Hair—
Squeeze On Cuticura Shampoo.

Better than soap shampoo—better than soapless shampoo—combines best features of both. Leaves hair brighter, softer, more manageable. And unbreakable squeeze bottle gives you up to 50% more shampoos!

"I don't mean their college work," he smiled. "I mean they learn to work with their hands. They learn about the lives of working people by working alongside them."

I followed that up. It was true. Middle Eastern students in America don't have enough money to enjoy the recreations they want. In America they find that as students they can actually earn money—in the college itself, and during vacations. Much more important, they learn that no social stigma attaches to it, but rather social approval.

One young man returned home from his American studies with several hundred dollars in his pocket. He explained to his astonished family that he had washed dishes on the campus, and on vacations worked in a mill and on ranches. His mother burst into tears. "Promise me you will never tell this to any of our friends," she moaned.

He tried to explain that one of his companions on the ranch was the son of a millionaire. "His pop thought it was swell that he wanted to work during the summer. You just don't understand. America is really a democracy."

But that young man is unhappy where he is. He wants to go back to America. (Too many do.)

But not all parents have the same attitude. The American Friends of the Middle East is doing much pre-embarkation work with students abroad, as it is helping them in our own country. Parents sometimes come to them now, begging for every help in getting their sons (and more and more their daughters) to American colleges. They say, "I want

All ambitions are lawful except those which climb upward on the miseries or credulities of mankind.

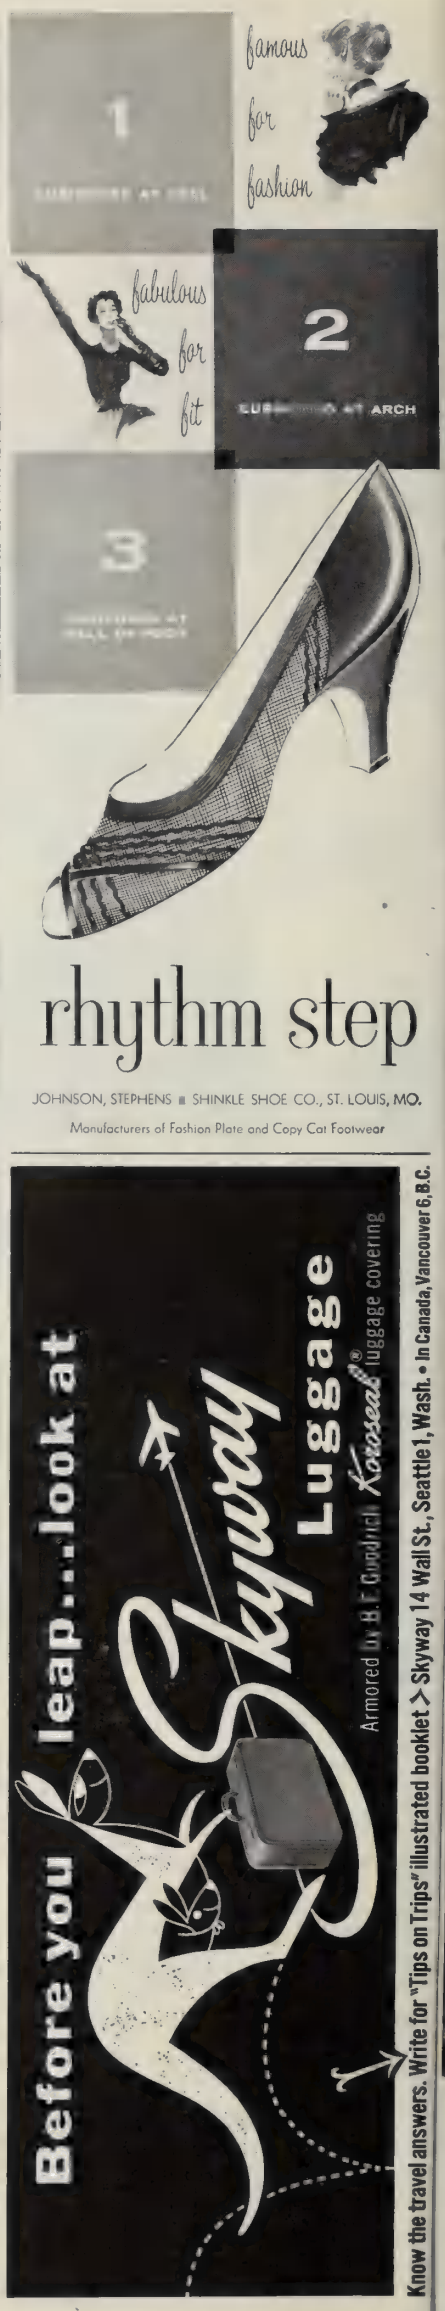
JOSEPH CONRAD

him to go to America because there he can learn to work—at anything worth doing for its own sake."

How about primary and secondary education?

I had a considerable discussion with a Turkish friend in Ankara, who is the director of a teachers' college and has spent much time in America.

"I am a hundred per cent for American education," she said. "You are right in many of your criticisms, but they are outweighed by other factors.



"Our traditional system gives a child from kindergarten through the tenth grade a great deal more knowledge than most of yours learn in college. It does, that is to say, for those who can take it. Ours is much like the Russian as I understand it. Since the days of the republic, we have, like the Russians, put an enormous emphasis on mathematics and science. But did the Russians tell you how many children really made the grade?"

I regretted that that was one matter on which I was unable to obtain any figures.

"Well, I will tell you about ours, and I don't think our children are, by nature, stupider than the Russian, or less industrious. We are a hard-working people who believe in work. But not more than fifty per cent of our children, despite exceptionally good discipline, can really assimilate what they are supposed to learn. We are also going in for mass education, according to our means, in Turkey. And America is the only country which has made even a halfway success of mass education. Our youth lack confidence in themselves. Their training instills timidity. Your youth are full of confidence, in themselves and in their country. And what they have to know, once they come up against it in real life, they learn quickly even if they never learned it in school."

So that's the other side of the American educational picture as I heard it in new, underdeveloped countries, beginning a new life.

Somewhere between this view and my own reservations probably lies the truth. END

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

"You ought to be thankful I escaped unhurt."

Royal couples, in spite of the conspicuousness of thrones and the public's close attention, are still sometimes humanly irritable. Take Prince Albert, of all people. It was after one of Queen Victoria's endless dinner parties, and he was intent on a game of four-handed chess. When the Queen, who was sitting close by, decided it was time to retire, she leaned over and said "Albert!" in a soft sweet voice. But Albert wasn't hearing. The next time she said his name, her voice was louder. She had to call several times, and each time her tone rose. According to Mrs. Stevenson, one of the ladies present, Albert was obviously not going to let himself be managed.

The wife of the American Minister to England, 1836–41, Sally Stevenson was a great gossip and a voluminous letter writer. VICTORIA, ALBERT AND MRS. STEVENSON, edited by Edward Boykin (Rinehart), is a collection of her chatty letters home. In it you'll get almost more than you can take.

Victoria had all the qualifications and failings of the typical woman, said her Prime Minister, Melbourne, who adored her. She was instinctive, personal, unintellectual, partisan, interested in detail, viewing things in the concrete rather than the abstract, and with a profound natural reverence for the secure and the respectable. (See MELBOURNE, by Lord David Cecil, one of the great biographies of all time, now available in paper-back edition of Grosset's Universal Library, $1.25.)

THE LETTERS OF THOMAS WOLFE, edited by his literary agent, Elizabeth Nowell (Scribner), brings back to life that giant personality, almost unique in American literature for its burning intensity. Like all his novels, these 700 letters are the outpourings of his tortured soul. "My life is a rude, rash gamble—a curse and a care . . ."

LETTERS OF JOYCE, edited by Stuart Gilbert (Viking), is quite another matter. James Joyce was forever short of money, his books were unappreciated and usually thoroughly disliked, he had iritis and nearly went blind. But his complaints are usually ironic understatements. "Today is the feast of St. Justin Marty, patron of Trieste, and I shall perhaps eat a cheap small pudding somewhere in his honor . . ."

"I get about fifty denunciations a week of my new work from all parts of the English-as-she-is-speaking world including Australia . . . now and then I have a little fun."

VIRGINIA WOOLF AND LYTTON STRACHEY: LETTERS, edited by James Strachey, his brother, and Leonard Woolf, her husband (Harcourt Brace), is an exchange of literary condescensions about the Bloomsbury circle, 1906–31, that borders on the querulous and the disagreeable. Strachey once proposed to Virginia and was accepted. But when he divined that she wasn't in love he made what he calls a "fairly honorable retreat." "The very minute it was happening," he wrote his brother, "the whole thing was repulsive to me." (Incidentally, the Woolfs' publishing house, Hogarth Press, was one of the many firms that turned down Joyce's Ulysses.**)

None of these letter writers would you want as your friend (except possibly Wolfe)! Nevertheless, here they stand, illumined from within. In their letters lie their true lives, and as such these four collections will be of greatest interest to the probing and curious among us. It is to these that they are here recommended.

Slowly and with complete absorption I have been reading THE BIBLE AS HISTORY, by Werner Keller (Morrow): A Confirmation of the Book of Books, based on scientific discoveries. If you are not a Bible reader this book will make you one; and for informed Bible readers, it gives depth and added meaning.

THE DAY CHRIST DIED (Harper) is an hour-by-hour account of that first Good Friday, by the author of The Day Lincoln was Shot, Jim Bishop. It starts at 6 P.M. on the eve of the Passover and lasts until 4 P.M. when He died.

Auto accidents in the U.S. (American Medical Association figures) were 100,000 totally disabled, 38,000 killed, in 1955. They are, of course, overwhelmingly beyond those of any other country. But here's a voice from Eire. "I'm tellin' ye now," said the old Irishwoman who had visited Dublin. "I was just steppin' aff o' the curb and a motor bike whizzed past me so close there wasn't the black of me nail between me and eternity, so there wasn't."

Family triangle: mother and child—and grandmother

GUY GILLETTE

The first child is most likely to cause disagreement in the family.

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

DR. SPOCK

"It requires extraordinary flexibility on the part of a grandmother to be able to accept the violent changes in child care in the past twenty years."

A recent letter from a West Coast mother says: "I gather, since you commented once that young mothers have a tendency to flaunt your book at grandmothers, that you feel that grandmothers are more put upon than offending, where conflict exists. Believe me, the grandmother is often the offender.

"The first seeds of resentment were sown in me during my pregnancy when my mother-in-law kept saying, 'I only hope the baby will have my son's features' or 'I hope he'll be smart like his daddy.'

"Since the baby's arrival I have been subjected to constant disapproval, especially in regard to toilet training (which my mother-in-law feels should be imposed early with a strong moral emphasis), in regard to my refusal to force feedings, and in regard to my easygoing caution which permits my child to explore by herself, even if it may result in a bump, a mistake or a mess. My mother-in-law assures me that because of her experience and age she inevitably knows best and that we are wrong not to accept her judgment. Frequently, I must confess, I reject a good suggestion because of the dictatorial manner in which it is made. She regards my refusal to accept some of her ideas as a personal rejection or an affront.

"She disapproves heartily of my outside interests (which do not interfere with my duties), calling them frivolous, and she makes us feel very guilty when we call on her two or three times a year for big occasions. Yet when I hint that I might get a baby sitter she is highly insulted.

"Occasionally I want to leave the baby with my mother. But my mother-in-law masks her selfishness in the guise of generosity and won't hear of it."

The faults of this grandmother are so apparent that perhaps you may not think it worth while to discuss them. But an exaggerated situation makes it easier to see factors that might not be obvious at all in a more ordinary situation. One thing that seems quite plain is that this grandmother is not just "selfish" and "dictatorial"—she's very jealous.

Before we go any further we should admit that we've heard only one side of this case. I continue to be amazed how different domestic conflict sounds after you hear the story from the party of the second part. In this particular case, though, I doubt whether the grandmother's story would make us change our minds very much. But if we could see the two women in action together I imagine we should see that the young mother is unwittingly playing some part in making this conflict possible. It takes two to make a quarrel, even when one is clearly the aggressor.

I don't want to pretend to know for sure what is going on between this mother and grandmother, because I, like you, have only the letter to go by. But I've worked with a number of young mothers whose main problem was their inability to stand up to an interfering grandmother, and most such cases have features in common. Perhaps you don't think it's fair for me to assume that the letter writer surrenders too easily. She implies that she does hold her ground in some respects—toilet training, feeding, avoiding overprotection—and that's all to the good. But she apparently gives in on the sitter situation. The most important evidence, to me, that the mother is surrendering too much is her tone of reproach and hurt feelings. Whether she wins or loses each argument, she seems to end up feeling the victim. This is not wholesome.

I think the basic problem is that a mother like this is afraid to hurt the feelings of the grandmother or afraid she will make her angry. There are several factors at work here. The mother is still young and inexperienced. The chances are good that when she's had another baby or two she won't be so timid. But this bashfulness of the beginner is only partly a matter of inexperience. We learn from psychiatric work that a girl in the adolescent period is apt to be quite rivalrous with her mother in her unconscious feelings. She feels that it's her own turn now to be the glamorous one, to lead the romantic life and to have the babies. She feels that it's time for her mother to take a back seat. (The boy's rivalry with his father is accentuated in adolescence too.) These rivalrous feelings may be expressed in a bold young person as open defiance—that's one reason why delinquency begins to be a common problem in adolescence. But the girl or young woman who has been brought up very strictly may react to her rivalry with her mother (or mother-in-law) in a guilty manner. Even when she knows she is technically in the right, she finds herself giving in, to a greater or lesser degree. Then, too, there is a special rivalry between daughter-in-law and mother-in-law. In the unconscious sense the daughter-in-law has succeeded in stealing the precious son of the mother-in-law. The self-assured young woman may enjoy this triumph. The overly considerate daughter-in-law is more apt to feel guilty about what she has got away with, especially if she is up against a possessive and disapproving mother-in-law.

The most obvious factor of all will be the character of the baby's grandmother—not only how opinionated and bossy and jealous she is, but how sharp she is in taking advantage of the young mother's sensitivity. This is what I meant by saying it takes two to make a quarrel. I didn't mean that the kind of mother who wrote the letter is quarrelsome in the aggressive sense. I meant that the mother who doesn't have enough confidence in her own convictions or who gets her feelings easily hurt or who is afraid of making the grandmother angry is the perfect victim for a grandmother who is overbearing and who knows how to make people feel guilty. There is a neat dovetailing between the two personalities. In fact, they are apt to accentuate progressively the defects in each other. Any tendency of the mother to submit to the grandmother's insistence encourages the grandmother to be still more dominating. And the mother's fear of hurting the grandmother's feelings makes the grandmother shrewdly threaten to have hurt feelings on every occasion. The grandmother in the letter "won't hear" of the mother's getting a sitter and she takes differences of opinion "as a personal affront." The angrier the mother becomes over the little insults and the domination, the more frightened she becomes that she will show it. She doesn't know how to get out of the painful situation. Like a car stuck in the sand, she digs in deeper and deeper. As the months go by she learns to do what all of us do when pain seems inevitable—we begin to get some perverse satisfaction out of it. One way is to feel sorry for ourselves, to dwell on the outrages we suffer and enjoy our own indignation. Another is to tell of our torture to others and enjoy their sympathy. These painful satisfactions tend to sap our determination to find a real solution. They become permanent substitutes for real happiness.

How can the young mother who has been submitting to a dominating grandmother extricate herself? It sounds as if she'd have to lift herself by her bootstraps. In a way she does have to, but it can be done gradually, with practice. In the first place, she can keep reminding herself that she is the mother now and that the baby is hers to take care of as she thinks best. She should make her own decisions and stick to them. She should be able to get support from the doctor or the public-health nurse when she has been made to doubt her own methods. She is surely entitled to the support of her husband, especially if it's his mother who is interfering. If he thinks that in a certain situation his mother is right, he should be able to say so to his wife. But at the same time he can show his mother that he stands with his wife against interference.

The most important step for such a mother is to realize clearly that it's her own guiltiness and fear of angering the grandmother which make her a target for bullying, to realize that she has nothing to be ashamed of or afraid of, and to develop gradually a thicker skin so that she can go her own way without feeling uneasy.

The man who understands one woman is qualified to understand pretty well everything.
JOHN BUTLER YEATS

Does the mother have to blow up at the grandmother to gain her own independence? Perhaps she may have to, once or twice. Most people who get imposed upon too easily have trouble learning to take a firm stand unless and until they feel thoroughly outraged—only then can they let loose with justifiable anger. The trouble with this system is that a dominating grandmother senses that the mother's unnatural patience and her final explosion are both signs that she is too timid. Both these signs encourage the grandmother to resume her bossing and needling again. In the long run the mother will be able to hold her ground and keep the grandmother at bay when she has learned how to speak up for herself right away, in a matter-of-fact, confident tone, before she gets angry. ("Well, the doctor told me to feed her this way." . . . "You see, I like to keep her as cool as possible." . . . "I don't want her to cry for long.") The calm, assured tone is usually the most effective way to convince the grandmother that the mother has the courage of her convictions.

In regard to the specific problems that the mother writes about, I think she should use her own mother and a professional sitter as often as seems appropriate, without mentioning it to her mother-in-law. If her mother-in-law finds out about it and raises a fuss, the mother should try not to seem guilty or to get mad but act as if it was the most natural thing in the world. She should try to avoid as many discussions about child care as possible. When the grandmother insists on arguing, she should try to act only mildly interested, refuse to argue, and change the subject as soon as politeness will permit. When the grandmother expresses the hope that the next baby will be smart and handsome like her side of the family, the mother can kid her about it, if she can learn to do it without showing hurt feelings. What all these steps add up to are: refusing to be put on the defensive, refusing to let her feelings be hurt, refusing to get excited. After a mother has learned the fundamentals of

How to Woo the Sandman

When it comes to sleeping habits, wee ones are certainly individualists. Some sleep lightly, others deeply. Some need more sleep than others. Some babies fight sleep, others welcome it. But over-all good sleeping habits can be cultivated with a bit of help from you. A few tricks that stand the strain of repetition well:

- Reasonable firmness in sticking to regular bedtime hours accustoms baby to routine.
- A warm, dry, well-fed infant is apt to succumb to the sandman more quickly.
- A few minutes of pre-crib cuddling or lullabying helps make bedtime a happy event.
- A well-ventilated draft-free room is also a great sleep encourager. 60° is about the right temperature.

4 Ways to Woo an Appetite

It's surprising how soon even tiny babies learn that a variety of flavors makes mealtime more interesting. When your doctor recommends cereal, you'll find Gerber Cereal Quads ideal for introducing cereal variety to baby. This handy, 4-in-1 package contains small-size boxes of Rice, Barley, Oatmeal and Cereal Food (a mixed cereal). By rotating all four, you'll soon learn which ones baby likes best. Once he indicates his favorites you can get these good-tasting Gerber Cereals in the regular large-size packages.

P.S. Gerber Cereal Quads make good traveling companions when you and baby go visiting.

Spooning Suggestions

First tries with cereal are apt to be more successful if you remember these basic hints:

Small spoon for a tiny mouth. Demitasse, small measuring spoon or regulation baby spoon.

Bird-size helpings for a tiny mouth. If spoon is too full, more food will go outside than in baby.

Feature of the Month (NEW JUICY STORY)

Gerber Strained Apple Juice

Gerber announces a new mild, refreshing juice for baby—Strained Apple Juice. Like Gerber Strained Orange Juice this pleasant tasting Apple Juice has a guaranteed high vitamin-C content . . . is carefully pasteurized for baby's protection. Gerber Strained Apple Juice can be alternated with Gerber Orange Juice for a delightful change of taste. Vitamin-C content is the same.

Rock-a-bye for Two

Lucky the mother who has an old-fashioned rocker, for the rocking chair has come into its own again. Seems that many doctors recommend rocking for both mother and baby. The gentle, soothing rhythm relieves tensions, lulls the happy twosome into sweet tranquility.

defending herself, she can go a step further by learning not to run away from the grandmother and not to be afraid to hear her out, because both these attitudes reveal, in a way, that she feels too weak to stand up to her.

I have been concentrating so far on the basic attitudes of the mother and grandmother and I have ignored the specific differences of opinion between the two women about such matters as the urging of food, the method and spirit of toilet training, the question of how much to try to protect a small child from minor accidents and how much to let her learn her own caution. Of course the first thing that can be said is that when there is a clash of personalities, the opportunities for differences of opinion are endless. In fact, two women who in actual practice would handle a child just about the same could still argue till kingdom come about theory, because there are two sides to any theory about child rearing—the only real question is where you decide to strike a balance. But when you are mad at somebody it's part of the fun to exaggerate the differences between your viewpoint and his and to battle on. If you detect an area of possible agreement, you shy away from it.

Now we ought to stop and admit that there have been violent changes in child-care teaching in the past twenty years. It requires extraordinary flexibility on the part of a grandmother to be able to accept them, to be able to stifle her anxiety about them. The grandmother was probably taught, when she was raising her children, that to feed a baby off schedule caused indigestion, diarrhea and spoiling, that regularity of the bowels was a cornerstone of health and that early rigorous toilet training would foster this. But now the grandmother is suddenly expected to believe that flexibility in feeding schedule is not only permissible but desirable, that there is no virtue in regularity of bowels, that toilet training should not be imposed against the child's will. It's hard to make these changes sound drastic to a young mother of today who is so familiar with them. To be able to sympathize with the alarm of a grandmother she would have to imagine some fantastic new advice such as to feed her newborn baby fried pork or to bathe him in cold water.

When a girl has been brought up with considerable disapproval—chafing against it and yearning to prove her competence—it's natural that as she first becomes a mother she will be touchy about advice from either grandmother, even if it is sensible, even if it is given tactfully. As a matter of fact, practically all new mothers are still close enough to adolescence and need so much to prove themselves that they show at least mild sensitivity about unsolicited advice. Most grandmothers, being sympathetic and tactful, realize this and try to keep their suggestions to a minimum.

But the young mother who, from her upbringing, has a bit of a chip on her shoulder is apt to carry the battle (about controversial methods) to the grandmother, without waiting for signs of disapproval from her. I've seen situations in which I was pretty sure that the mother was going to great lengths in self-demand scheduling or in delaying toilet training or in allowing the child to make a terrible mess at meals or in permitting him to be dramatically rude, not because she herself really believed in such extremes but because she sensed unconsciously how much the grandmother would be upset. Here was a chance for the mother to kill several birds with one stone. to tease the grandmother endlessly, to get back at her for all her past disapproval of the mother, to prove how old-fashioned and ignorant and wrong the grandmother was in her methods, to prove how enlightened the mother is. course most of us as parents and grandparents use arguments about modern or old-fashioned principles of child rearing as weapons in our family squabbles. Usually no great damage is done and there is even some enjoyment in it. The harm comes in carrying on a major war over a period of years because, after all, the children are used as ammunition.

Before ending this discussion I want to remind you that I took a letter about an unusually tense situation in order to bring out some of the underlying factors that make for tension. Such cases are few. At the opposite end of the scale are the fortunate families in which all is harmony between the generations. In a majority of families we have mild to moderate disagreements, particularly in regard to the first child. I think it is admirable that we can usually get along as well as we do, considering the recent changes in philosophy which act as a constant temptation to argument.

In some respects it's too bad that we have such a strong tradition in America that it's better for a young couple to set up housekeeping in a separate home, preferably removed at some distance from the grandparents, and that the grandmother should be very careful not to offer advice. Instead, the inexperienced mother gets her instruction from doctors and public-health nurses and other counselors. To be sure, there are lots of advantages in such a separation of households, especially during a period of transition.

Labor and trouble one can always get through alone, but it takes two to be glad. IBSEN

But throughout the greater part of the world the young parents live with or near the grandparents, without ever stopping to think of this as a hardship. They take it for granted that the grandmother is the expert in child care and that she will devote a lot of time to teaching and helping the mother. This can be an enormous comfort to the inexperienced mother, especially at those times of stress such as the newborn period and during illnesses. The young mother then acquires knowledge and assurance and eventual independence by easy, natural steps.

In America, too, the mother who lives close to the grandmother and who gets along with her should be able to gain a great deal of help and support from her, even though there are doctor and nurse to advise on medical matters. There are literally hundreds of questions the first few weeks at home and every time there is a new development or a new illness. It's the mother who is most mature and most secure who can ask for advice with the greatest ease, because she has no fear of being dominated. If she decides that what she hears doesn't suit her or her baby, she can tactfully turn it down without making a fuss about it, since she doesn't have pent-up feelings of resentment or guilt. The grandmother, on her part, is pleased to be asked advice. She doesn't accumulate anxieties about how the baby is being managed because she knows she'll have a chance to express her opinion from time to time. Though she's careful not to do it too often, she isn't afraid to offer an unsolicited suggestion occasionally, since she knows that the mother will not be upset by this and will feel free to turn it down if it doesn't suit her.

Perhaps I make this sound too ideal for real life, but in general outline I think it is correct. Anyway, I want to make it clear that it's a sign of maturity and self-assurance to be able to ask for advice and help. I want to encourage mothers and grandmothers to find ways of getting along easily because of the profound benefit and enjoyment that not only both of them but the children, too, will receive from such a relationship.

Although he cannot answer letters personally, Dr. Spock will be glad to hear from readers and will discuss in these pages problems of general interest.—Ed.

DIARY of DOMESTICITY

By Gladys Taber

Newly mown grass, green and damp, is the headiest perfume of May.

The hyacinths I picked today smell sweet and cool. They look so tropical that I can hardly believe they are growing in New England. Every year they are a surprise. The white daffodils I can now, after a long time, accept, but the heavy spikes of purple and pink and white hyacinths amaze me as if I had seen them for the first time this morning.

There were flickers down by the pond, and a towhee on the feeder. The mourning doves cried their mournful song from the swamp, and I know it does not mean they are sad, for there is plenty of grain for them. We feed the birds year round, and if the population changes, whoever comes is hungry. In summer the goldfinches and rosy purple finches take over. If you live in the country, the wild shy people are always with you.

Andy was mowing the lawn as I went out to pick my bouquet. Somehow the first mowings are especially lovely, the grass smells better than any perfume and the clippings are so green and damp. Whenever I am dissatisfied with my lot, I reflect on grass. It would be so discouraging to be cut down every time you grew an inch!

When the air is filled with sun and the garden with spring flowers, I find it much easier to make lists of all I have to do than to start doing it. It is much simpler to write down WASH ALL WINDOWS than to get out the cleaner and the cloth and begin the job. And it is easier to plan to polish the silver the next rainy day than to begin it on a day when the sky is so blue and the sun so pure, and it is more fun to go to the edge of the woods and transplant a few more violets.

I believe most homemaking women have too much conscience. I have to work at it myself, for I was raised to take care of the house always before going outside. But some of the days I remember best are those when mamma suddenly said, "We'll just go for a ride and look at the apple trees in blossom."

I remember one such day when father was off on a business trip, and mamma and I left the washing unwashed and the mattresses unturned and just went off. We ate sandwiches and hard-boiled eggs by a stream and talked as we ate. We talked to each other as friends, not mother and daughter, and it is one of my best memories. Not all the house cleaning in the world would remain in my mind as that day when I could tell mamma my dreams and hopes and fears, and she told me some of hers. The house has long since been lived in by many others, sold and resold, so who cares whether it was properly cleaned that day?

I was reminded of this when a friend wrote that she really wanted a cocker, but would shedding be a problem? Living is a problem, I thought, trying to answer her. When the children were little, I often got tired and frustrated because as fast as I cleaned up, they cut paper dolls all over the front sofas or strewed toys so thickly that walking from room to room was a hazard. But an immaculate and lifeless house would not have been the same. And so when Holly brings in a milk carton she fished out of the trash and I have to get the broom, or Jonquil or Teddy digs a neat hole, wallows in it, and carries in a nice mud sheath, I stop to reflect. Yes, it makes trouble. No doubt about it. But the compensations cannot be measured.

But it is all in your point of view. I think the best way to keep a house spotless would be not to live in it at all, just come in and clean twice a week and then shut it all up. But there would be no laughter, no warmth and no fun. And when Holly, the Irish, dances in carrying a potato in her mouth as a special treasure, I call to Jill, "Have we any more potatoes?"

"Yes," she says, "but this was scrubbed. I'll wash more."

May is still so cool that company for supper is easy. For an easy buffet meal we like Vera Wilkins' veal casserole, a nice change from chicken.

Two cups diced roast veal begins it. Add 1 cup chopped celery and ½ cup chopped green onions, tops and all (right out of the garden if yours are that far along), ¼ cup chopped green pepper, 1 can cream of chicken soup with ½ can of milk added. One can chow mein noodles (save ¼ cup for topping), 1 four-ounce can button mushrooms, 1 teaspoon soy sauce and ½ teaspoon steak sauce, plus salt and pepper to taste (and where is the cook that does not taste? Half the fun of it).

This is mixed together and put in a greased casserole, topped with the reserved noodles and baked at 350° F. until bubbly.

The crisp noodles are a nice change from rice or boiled noodles.

With this we serve a salad and hot rolls and dessert. A mixed compote of fruit is good, and cheese and crackers. So many people are dieting nowadays that if we have a rib-sticking main dish, we go light on dessert. I hate to see guests look wistful as a nice pie comes on.

I have read a good deal about entertaining in various publications, but my theory is that if you ask people you like, they will be happy.

Once we had a very odd assortment of dog folk and, of all things, interior decorators and bankers. They had a wonderful time. In fact, they talked so much and so long that I wondered whether we would ever get to bed before morning.

My theory is that unless people have personal feuds, they can always be happy talking their heads off if the dinner is hot and served reasonably well.

On May evenings, I keep wandering out to do some minor chore in the yard. It is so wonderful to go out without galoshes and a heavy jacket that I cannot resist it.

When we first came here, the swamp was piled high with refuse. We cleaned that out. But now I am not above lugging a pan of vegetable scraps and just heaving them into the muck. And I like to wander around the yard, smelling the good green smell of growing things.

When the cold air comes down, as it still does in May, we like to listen to music. I know that I am old-fashioned, for I cannot enjoy rock 'n' roll. It seems so noisy, and I never did like noise. Even when I was very little, I took a dim view of firecrackers. I always wanted pretty things that made stars in the air. But, we can listen to records of classical music or folk songs and I feel comfortable. I turn the television off the minute someone begins to screech.

Children are natural mimics—they act like their parents in spite of every attempt to teach them good manners. —ANON

It may well be that, living in the country, one's ears get more sensitive. For we hear the foxes bark up the hill, and we hear the squirrel leaping on the bird feeder to eat everything up. We hear the birds uttering delicate sounds as they come in from the woods to see what we have to offer them. We hear the sound of a saw on the upland road as someone cuts wood for the cookstove.

But we are not tuned to much noise; most of our life is very quiet, except for the barking of cockers and Irish when a stray car comes down our dead-end dirt road.

Most of the time, it is so still that I can walk out and hope to see my unicorn stepping softly down from the wild, untrod woods to crop my violets. The brook runs clear in the moonlight, the air smells of apple blossoms, and he bends his silver horn as he comes to drink. The unicorn is legendary, and immortal. In the golden age, proud ladies threaded silver needles and embroidered his picture. He pranced in tapestries, and his beauty was thought to be fatal.

But there is no reason to suppose he finds our Connecticut woods alien. And May is his time.

Often we drive along the country roads in the last light of day, just to look at spring. The little white farmhouses are set about with daffodils and tulips. Old apple trees fill the air with pink sweetness. The meadows look soft as silk. The hills are smoky blue.

When we turn toward our own home, stars begin to come out. The cats are sitting on the picket gate. The cockers wait on the terrace. The Irish sets up a clamor that is deafening.

"Whatever could you see half so wonderful as we are?" they wish to know. END

Beauty figure for Summer

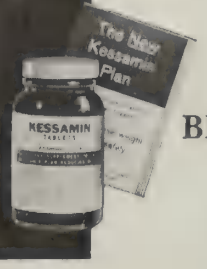
The slim figure of fashion
The trim figure of health

McKesson offers a new Beauty Plan ...the Kessamin Plan...to help you lose 5 to 14 lbs. pleasantly, safely!

Vacation this year with a pretty new figure. Look much smarter in revealing summer fashions. Feel more alive without the burden of overweight. Here is a plan to help you reduce safely, easily, pleasantly—and what's more, to keep your figure attractive and slender. It is called the Kessamin Plan.

The Kessamin Plan was compiled by a Doctor and a Nutritional expert. It is safe for your health, it's sensible—and it really does work.

The Kessamin Plan helps you shed unwanted weight—without hunger pangs, without the nerves or fatigue that often go with losing weight—all this without dangerous drug side-effects.



With the Kessamin Plan, healthful, enjoyable menus are supplemented with the almost magic formula Kessamin #14. These little tablets contain essential nutritional vitamins and iron to keep you feeling well, plus a neutral food additive that makes smaller food helpings—seem quite enough. Thus, the Kessamin Plan helps you change over to better eating—painlessly—so you can easily prevent the return of excess weight.

It's guaranteed! Either you are pleased and happy with what the Kessamin Plan and Kessamin #14 do for you—either you win a new beauty figure—lose weight, and feel better—or your money back!

Ask your physician about reducing. Consult your druggist about the Kessamin Plan. Your druggist will tell you it is based on natural, normal, healthful processes. Your druggist will trust your confidence in wanting to lose weight. Along with your doctor, he is the man most concerned with your, and your family's health. As with other fine McKesson products, Kessamin is one more example of how McKesson "makes it better—so it's better for you."

Star of the Tucson, Arizona, cleanup campaign—the Litterbug himself, in person. "A hard case," workers decided as they followed his messy trail along streets, highways, into parks, "but his days are numbered."

COMMUNITIES DECLARE WAR ON THE LITTERBUG ... Arizona to Vermont

Litterbugs Can be Taught Better Manners

By MARGARET HICKEY

Education and law enforcement are the most effective weapons in defeating America's highway-litter problem, a recent survey proves. In eight of the forty-four states which have antilitter laws, "putting real teeth" in those laws brought a noticeable reduction of highway litter and the $15 to $50 a mile per year cost of cleaning it up.

In Idaho, where litter penalties are minor and seldom enforced, litter goes on increasing every year. On the other hand, Georgia's new antilitter law—$1000 fine or a year's imprisonment—has brought "plain to see" improvement. Through campaigns of public education and stricter law enforcement, Ohio reduced its cleanup costs from a 1953 high of $625,733 to last year's more encouraging $344,452.

"If you can make people see that they cost themselves money by throwing litter, they generally stop doing it," says Keep America Beautiful, Inc. With headquarters at 99 Park Avenue, New York 16, N.Y., this national public-service organization for the prevention of litter will provide cleanup blueprints to citizens' committees, schools and other groups interested in conducting antilitter campaigns in their communities. END

The blue convertible pulled out, flashed past the gray sedan and pulled back into the line of traffic. As it sped away, a hand reached out, carelessly tossing an object—an object that glittered in the afternoon sunlight. It came hurtling back toward the gray sedan.

Even as driver Kenneth Barrett's instinct made him spin the steering wheel frantically to avoid the flying object, his reason recognized it for what it was—a pop bottle. Reason also told him what that bottle might do if it hit his windshield. His wife and eight-month-old son were beside him.

The Barretts do not remember with any clarity the happenings of the next few seconds. They felt their car hit the soft shoulder at the side of the road, skid sickeningly, then lurch and bump to a stop in a field beyond, with Kenneth fighting both wheel and brake pedal to avoid overturning.

Cars stopped and people ran to help. The Barretts sat and stared at each other, unable to believe that they had escaped uninjured.

The Barretts were lucky—luckier than the 750 to 1000 people who are killed, the 100,000 who are seriously injured in car accidents each year as drivers hit or frantically try to avoid objects tossed to the highways by "litterbug" motorists.

A widespread, hard-to-control pest with the tenacity and destructiveness of the boll weevil, the litterbug is a luxury many Americans may not even know they are supporting. Last year it cost us $50,000,000 to gather up the discarded litter with which litterbugs trash-bordered the nation's highways.

There is no source for accurate totals in dollars of what it costs to clean up the litterbug blight from our national parks and forests (two other favorite litterbug haunts), but appropriations for the maintenance of these areas have had to be increased again this year.

Officials know that they must allot a disproportionate share of funds to cleanup work instead of spending it to expand and improve the national parks and forests so that more people can enjoy them. These officials do not feel kindly toward the litterbugs as they study blackened scars which once were forests, knowing these scars mark a picnic fire abandoned still burning, or a smoldering tossed-away cigarette. Money alone cannot obliterate this kind of litterbug blight—it takes time.

The litterbug's cash cost can sometimes be estimated. The toll he takes of America's beauty and national pride—"Well, all you can do about estimating that is to groan!" says one state highway official, eying a trail of pop bottles, beer cans, tissues, crumpled cigarette packages, gum and candy wrappers leading to—and from—his state's No. 1 tourist attraction.

The litterbug, alas, is peculiarly American. You do not often find his careless trail in other countries. Edna Ferber, the celebrated novelist, arriving home from a stay in Europe, ruffled a lot of prideful civic feelings with her statement, "New York is the most disgustingly filthy city in the world."

In indignant rebuttal statistics were quoted about the number of bathtubs, automatic washers, vacuum cleaners, and so on, owned by American families. And we were reminded that American germ-consciousness has resulted in everything from pasteurization of the milk we drink to double wrapping of most of the edible objects we buy.

A few did point out that all this wrapping and packaging creates a lot of litter. Most other countries CONTINUED ON PAGE 42 do not package their goods so extravagantly. Containers have value and can be reused, wrappings are seldom indiscriminately discarded on streets or highways.

This fact was brought home to one American visiting in Scotland recently. Admiring the beauty of the Scottish countryside from a touring bus, he unwrapped a stick of gum, popped it into his mouth and absently tossed the wrapper out the window. Instantly the driver brought the bus to a halt. "We don't do that in Scotland," he said reproachfully. "You'll want to pick that paper up." Red-faced, the visitor obeyed. "I just didn't think," he said honestly.

"In days gone by," says another American deeply concerned with the problem of our littered country, "when people had wood stoves instead of gas or electric ranges and refuse was easily burnable, families more or less took care of their own refuse problems. Now, however, a great many containers are indestructible as far as the average consumer is concerned."

This is pointed up in a report issued by the U. S. Public Health Service and the American Public Works Association, of Chicago. The startling fact is that the majority of smaller cities and towns in the United States have no adequate system for collecting or disposing of refuse.

Whether it is because the people of other countries don't have as much litter-making material as we have, or because they do have tidier manners, no one contests that Americans wear the crown as world's champion litterbugs.

Whoever kindles the flames of intolerance in America is lighting a fire underneath his own home.

Where I Stand (Copyright 1947 by Harold E. Stassen, reprinted by permission of Doubleday & Company, Inc.)

What is a litterbug?

Only the newest editions of the dictionary define the word. Perhaps you'd find out more quickly by asking any school child in . . . well, in Tucson, Arizona, or Montpelier, Vermont. Both cities are among the more than 6000 communities where citizen-sparked antilitter campaigns are now attempting to educate heedless trash tossers to the fact that the world is not their wastebasket. Children have a prompt answer to your question:

"A litterbug is a messy, two-legged animal that travels around turning the country into a dump and spoiling it for other people."

The children's ideas on litterbug control range from a thoughtful sixth-grader's "Teach them not to be litterbugs" to the ominous "Get the litterbugs!" of a seven-year-old bow-and-arrow-bearing follower of TV's Robin Hood. (Fortunately for slow-to-learn litterbugs, his arrows are blunt-tipped.)

Rimmed by rugged mountains, Tucson, Arizona, is colorful and sunlighted under a clear blue desert sky. "You can see even one discarded tin or paper for miles in this wide-open country," a former mayor says ruefully. "And we had thousands!"

The antilitter campaign was planned by citizens who saw that in an area attracting many tourists (Arizona drew 12,000,000 last year), the problem of littered highways was more than just an affront to their own eyes.

"We think our part of the country is beautiful. We want others to see it that way too," says committee chairman Chris Reilly. "The antilitterbug idea caught the school children's imagination. They wanted to do something about it—and they did."

Brand-new Liberty School held dedication ceremonies in "the cleanest, most polished grounds you ever saw," result of a contest to see which class could carry away the most litter.

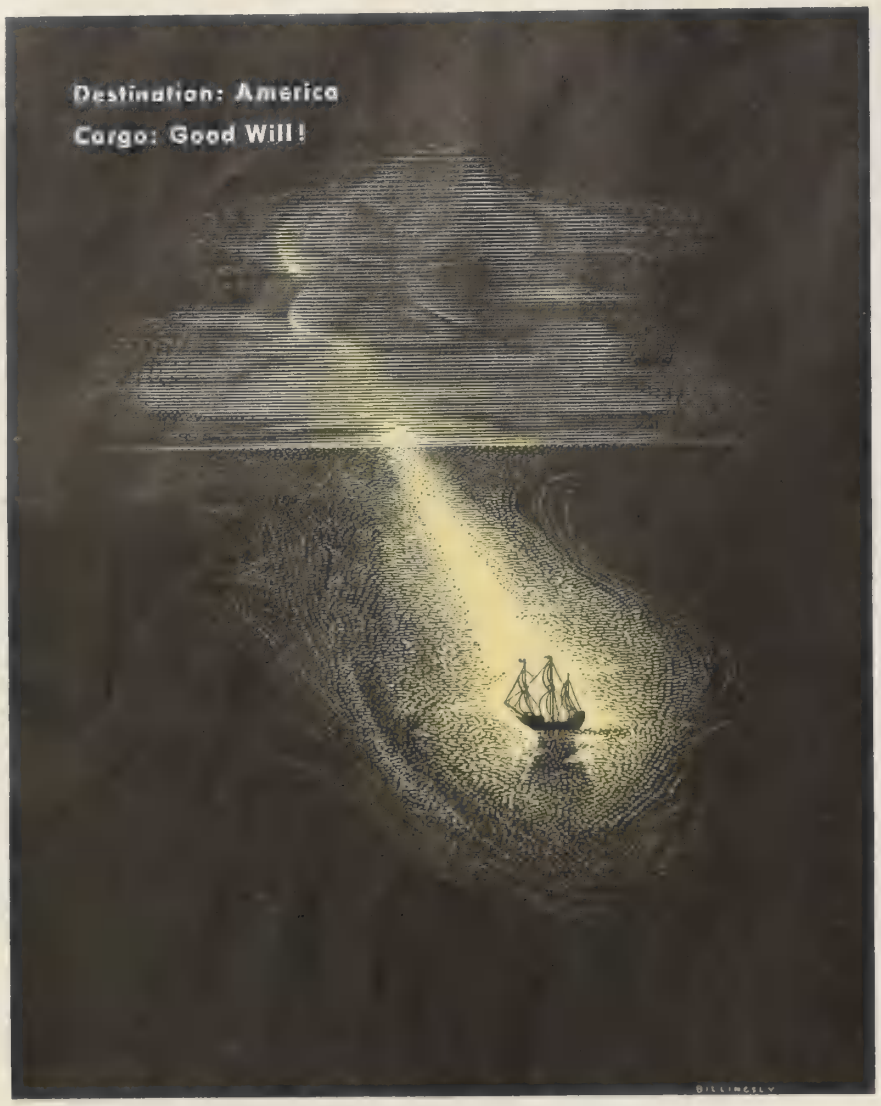
he whole kernel corn style for family cooking—family serving

Look for this new Del Monte Corn label—get eet fresh corn flavor... plus these advantages, too!



You needn't stand over this corn to heat it! Keep liquid on DEL MONTE Family-Style Corn, let it heat as label directs. No fear of scorching, even if the phone rings or children interrupt.

No stirring, no butter needed to keep from sticking to the pan! There's enough liquid so you can get this corn hot all through and keep it hot, without stirring. Then if you like, butter each serving freshly, like fresh corn.

Leftovers in liquid stay amazingly sweet, juicy and fresh-tasting! Dinner has to wait? Split-shift serving for children and grown-ups? This corn will wait.—turn off heat, leave corn in liquid, reheat later. Keep any left over in liquid in the refrigerator—it stays so attractive, you'll say it's as good the second day as the first.

Now—try DEL MONTE Family-Style Corn for carefree cooking and more family eating fun!

The Mayflower Sails Again!

She's on her way . . . an exact replica of the little ship that served as seedpod for a new nation!

She's a gift from the British people to the American people. In her hold are good-will offerings: oak chests containing articles representing the highest standards of modern British manufacture and craftsmanship, and specially-bound Bibles for the governors of our New England States.*

She'll be berthed permanently at Plimoth Plantation in Plymouth, Massachusetts. This is a 100-acre reconstruction of the original Pilgrim settlement, complete with Common Store House, Trading Post, Indian Village and Museum. It is now being built, and will become a national shrine after the Mayflower is handed over to it on Thanksgiving Day, 1957.

We hope you'll visit Plimoth Plantation, and come aboard the Mayflower. Bring the children, too. Can you think of a better way of bringing history to life?

AMERICA'S FINEST LONG-DISTANCE MOVING SERVICE

Members of the Blenman School patrol arrived one morning to find a box of trash—papers, bottles, tins—tossed over the fence into their schoolyard. They picked it up, reporting indignantly to their teachers, "Our janitor shouldn't have to clean up some nasty litterbug's mess!" On their own, patrol members began arriving at school extra early to police up the yard before patrol duty.

Pulling into Wrightstown School one morning, the big yellow school bus echoed to teasing taunts of "Litterbug!" as a curly-haired first-grader dropped a wadded paper on the floor in her hurry to leave the bus. "I am not!" she protested furiously, retrieving the paper and trotting over to the trash can with it. "I forgot!"

And at the Davis School—oldest in the Tucson public-school system—diminutive teacher Vickie Lonsac's second-graders put together a three-dimension litterbug portrait using trash picked up in the schoolyard.

"We made a tissue bush too." Towheaded David displays a dried tumbleweed covered with white paper blossoms. "Just like the bushes along the highways!" he grins wickedly.

Miss Lonsac's pupils learned a lesson. "We live in a free country," small Mexican-American Richard stands up to explain. "In a free country you can do what you want"—he pauses for just the right words—"if you don't hurt other people. Litterbugs do hurt other people. Even in a free country it's wrong to be a litterbug."

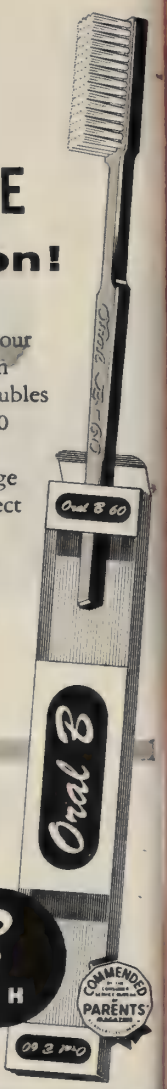
I put the relation of a fine teacher to a student just below the relation of a mother to a son, and I don't think I could say more than this.

THOMAS WOLFE
(Unseen Harvests—A Treasury of Teaching—
Edited by Fuess and Basford—
The Macmillan Co.—1947)

"We need a permanent program," Chairman Reilly said thoughtfully. "Education, publicity to keep the public aware of the campaign, law enforcement."

"Police and highway departments have promised co-operation," Mrs. J. H. Weadock said. "Any litterbug who has to make a special trip to City Hall to pay a fine is going to think twice before tossing trash out his car window again."

Cautioned "Wendy" Parsons, of the campaign's community-action group, "We need a law suspending a litterbug's driver's license, as Massachusetts has."



Tucson's businesses and organizations were active in this campaign—clubs like the Garden Club and Altrusa, P.T.A., Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts, DeMolay and others. Newspapers published editorials, news and pictures. TV and radio stations helped tell the story. A major oil company provided colorful posters urging motorists to tidier travel habits. This same oil company once tried presenting litter bags to motorists with the plea that they put their en-route trash in the bags and dispose of them at their next service-station stop. "Motorists accepted the litter bags," a company official says. "They even filled them with trash. But then they threw them out car windows to litter highways more glaringly than ever—and with the name of our company stamped on every trash-filled bag!" This experience has not discouraged them, though. "People have to be educated to the seriousness of the litter problem. Then they'll respond."

Tucson housewife Mrs. E. H. Bayse contributed a costume for a five-foot-plus litterbug. Impersonated by a committee member ("My identity had better remain a secret!" this member said after a stricken look in a mirror), the Litterbug was eye-catching. He had the yellow-and-black-striped body of a wasp, a basketball-sized green head with a black patch over one eye ("to symbolize the blindness of litterbugs"). His wings sported multicolored markings. His manners—well,

"His manners were awful!" one eight-year-old stated bluntly after meeting the Litterbug on a busy downtown street. "He threw papers all over the sidewalk and laughed."

The Litterbug turned up at City Hall to publicize the mayor's proclamation of anti-litter week. He flitted startlingly through stores, offices, banks. At a Rotary Club luncheon, he dropped in to dump litter on the floor and emphasize his rudeness with a sign demanding, "Are you a Litterbug too?" He also visited schools.

"That," says the Litterbug's impersonator wryly, "was almost fatal. The kids had learned almost too well what to do about a litterbug—exterminate it! One athletic youngster was all set to do this with a baseball bat. I admired his direct approach, but I began to wish the wings on this costume really worked."

A two-day, concentrated cleanup drive began. Trash trailers and bins were set up at designated sites, schoolyards manned by volunteer workers as collection points. Trucks called at homes to pick up "difficult" trash too cumbersome to be removed without help or by the city's regular collectors.

Tucson school children held poster and verse contests. They watched a movie depicting the annual litterbug havoc in national parks and forests. They could see some of this havoc in their own Coronado Forest. Most of them had enjoyed the summertime coolness of pine-shaded Mount Lemmon as a respite from the desert's summer heat, or loaded the family car with skis for a winter outing on the mountain's snowy slopes. They had picnicked under the towering walls of lovely Sabino Canyon, cooking their hamburgers at neat stone fireplaces and unloading picnic baskets at tables provided for the purpose. (The tables are cement now. Too many of the earlier wooden ones were chopped up for picnic firewood.)

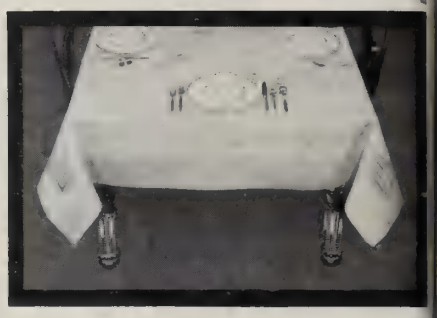
The trail of the litterbug is all too clear in "Sabino." Rusty tins and broken bottles mar the once-sparkling stream at the bottom of the canyon. Paper plates, cartons and wrappings litter the picnic areas despite trash cans neatly installed underground.



"All you have to do is step on this pedal," demonstrates Pierre Early, caretaker at Sabino Canyon, "and drop your trash inside. It's surprising how many people—people who keep their own homes and yards as neat as pins—won't bother to step on that pedal out here. We had 400,000 visitors in the canyon last year—all welcome. But you should see the place on a Monday morning after a nice sunny Sunday!"

Last year's cleanup bill for the recreation areas of the Coronado Forest came to more than $40,000. "There aren't that many weeks!" an awed third-grader gasped, using his own weekly allowance as a gauge.

Caretaker Early sees improvement since Tucson's antilitter campaign got under way. "Litter in the canyon is 30 per cent less since the campaign started. A Boy Scout work party came out and did a cleanup job for us. Fraternities at the university are replacing 'Hell Week' with 'Help Week' cleanup projects."

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

"I'll be glad when you get home! I can't find anything!"

My wife cautions me never to tell a woman she looks tired, unless she's lying on a hospital stretcher or has just fainted from exhaustion. "Girls like to say they are tired," she explains, "but don't like to look tired!"

I celebrated my sister's birthday by arranging a four-way phone hookup, to connect me cross-country with all three of my sisters. It cost only $8 and was as much fun as a champagne dinner.

One of our son's letters from Japan was delivered at our front door within 48 hours after he wrote it; not even special delivery. It squeezed us closer together and made the sprawling world seem much cozier.

A few of our town's Yale-type intellectuals wear glasses with rims almost one half inch thick. They seem to be staring through magic casements on faery seas forlorn, and their glasses don't break when they drop 'em.

"Look at that!" exclaims Betty Comfort, shrugging toward a new $85,000 "ranch house" across the road. "Snobbery and envy cause as much trouble as greed and sex, and I'm as bad as anybody."

Our youngest lost his red-haired temper about teachers' salaries. "When I hear how much money some dumbbells make," he exclaimed, "I think teachers deserve a big fat raise right away!"

When I see one of Tennessee Williams' peculiar plays I invariably come out into the fresh air a bit baffled. He seems to make it seem abnormal to feel normal.

Although Doc Will Menninger didn't exactly say it when he spoke to our great state's legislators, I gathered he thinks we need more psychiatrists far more urgently than we need more aches-and-pains wizards (ordinary doctors).

One of our town's best dancers is a tweeds-and-cashmere man; his expression on the dance floor is ineffable. Recently his wife revealed that at home she has a problem: he has sixty pipes, from corncob to calabash, from meerschaum to ventilated chrome.

I reminded my Dream Girl recently that she was sitting in her azure convertible at the edge of the airfield when I flew my first solo. When I finally mustered enough courage to land, instead of kissing the turf I kissed her.

My serious-minded neighbor asks me why our state doesn't run advertisements in the magazines bragging about our two U. S. senators the way Arkansas brags about hers. "First thing you know," he mutters, "ours'll feel insecure."

At our club luncheon table we agreed that baseball, football and basketball might well try out a "penalty box" like hockey, in which penalized teams play one man short. Wouldn't the Yankees look silly playing an inning with only two outfielders!

If I forced my Princess of Sheer Delight to assume the cramped position she adopts to cultivate her garden (crouched like Yogi Berra), she'd accuse me of cruelty, mayhem and sadism. Yet she maintains it for hours, obviously happy.

That red-haired college girl down the block is a traitor to her generation. "My dad and mother told me my boy friend wasn't fit for me to marry," she says, "so I didn't, and I soon learned they were right." Is this a trend?

"A husband who admits to his wife that she snores is a cad," moralizes Peter Comfort, painting his garage doors yellow, "but he can wake her up and make her turn over on the pretext that she's talking in her sleep."

The arrival of Harlan Miller the Third inspired an argument: should he be 3rd or III? I'm neutral, predict he will be called Butch or Stinky.

Our town's lovingest couple owned up during a bridge game recently that they average better'n a quarrel a week. "She once hit me with a loaded picnic basket!" he brags.

Our little circle of serious thinkers is aghast at British critic John Osborne's opinion that America is a "sexual nut house." But they're inclined to blame American hushers and shushers who forget God devised sex.

I wish I could remember where I leave some of my gadgets to be repaired. Alas, it haunts me that dozens of things that have vanished from our house have long ago been "sold for charges," an act I regard as banditry.

Another reason why I prefer to lunch at 1 o'clock: between 12 and 1 Main Street is crowded with a fascinating blend of people, quintessence of 1000 generations of breeding. I like to take a walk and study their dead-pan faces.

Earlier in our marriage I tried to pretend that I was an all-round mechanic, ready and able to fix anything around the house that went wrong. Things are more complicated now, and my invariable response to my wife's moans is, "Better phone the man."

One of our town's cynics thinks that the influence of the public-school executive over the P.T.A. has grown stronger since so many more of our school principals are now suave, attractive males. What an unworthy thought!

Our young execs' wives are crusading for a zoo: a modern gem of a miniature zoo not much like the Bronx or the Brookfield. One group: a goose, a pelican and a swan in a small fountain, to let the children study resemblances among distant cousins.

Over a dish of ravioli at Vic Talerico's or a circle of pizza at Bisignano's, we often shudder to think what dining out in some American regions might be without a few Italian restaurants. (Or what American life might be without a few million Italians.)

If we're frugal and thrifty all year, maybe we can visit Japan while Junior is over there flying off the coast of Asia. I don't know anything else that'd inspire my Dream Girl to such heroic feats of self-denial.

Our country club's experts on the ladies are almost agreed that a baseball game is a severe test of a woman's charm and aplomb. If she can survive a sacrifice fly and a double play unruffled, she's born to reign over men.

. . . When my daughter offers me cents an hour to come and baby-sit,

. . . Or Junior enrolls in a Japanese language class at his faraway air base,

. . . And our youngest wins a 2-minus in physics and so decides to take chemistry,

. . . Or I overhear my Dream Girl bragging about me a few minutes after she pinned my ears back,

. . . Then my heart goes out to the lonely one third of humanity which never married.

Disease of Weakness

New Orleans, Louisiana

Dear Sir: In "The Mysterious Disease of Weakness" (January JOURNAL), the author has chosen to perpetuate an historical error and omission.

The enigma of this supposedly incurable disease was broken by the report of Harriet Edgeworth on the remarkable effect obtained with ephedrine in myasthenia gravis. Her report appeared in the Journal of the American Medical Association in May, 1933, and to this day patients often do better on a combination of ephedrine and neostigmin. The cost of this treatment cannot be said to be prohibitive.

It might also have benefited some individuals in malarial territory to know that quinine aggravates myasthenic symptoms. Very truly yours,

GEORGE F. FASTING, M.D.

▶ Dr. Harriet Edgeworth's discovery was an important advance, but it was Dr. Walker's discovery of physostigmine which led to the uncovering of the physiologic defect and modern treatment. Ephedrine can enhance the effect of other drugs in some patients. ED.

All This and Good Food Too?

Sheepscott, Maine

Dear Editors: I have been laughing to myself up here in my Maine paradise, for I know a way to lose weight that is better than any.

Every day I walk down a beautiful country road for a wonderful, wonderful mile, and then I walk back again, savoring every single inch of all the delight on either side of my path. I walk in wind and rain and snow. I stop to trace the deer and weasel tracks, the marks the foxes make, and the rabbit's path as well. I look up at the sky and up at the trees, and I listen to the hundreds of small sounds. I heard an owl hoot the other night, and I always hear the crows and blue jays and the chickadees. In spring there will be wild geese, and in summer a multitude of songs from all kinds of feathered throats. I have lost twenty-five pounds in fourteen months. Could any other way to reduce be so pleasurable? Sincerely,

MARA E. MULLIGAN

Despite All Obstacles

Mt. Vernon, New York

Dear Editors: I am crippled with rheumatoid arthritis. My hands first became deformed when I was a little girl fifty years ago—and now, following a fall, one of my legs will not bend. At times, I have thought I would never walk again, but I am living in my own "home" all alone and liking it, despite all obstacles. I am telling my story not for sympathy—that won't help a bit—but to help others who are handicapped.

We should follow the Bible words, "whatsoever thy hand findeth to do." We should knit, dust, cook—and whatever else we can force ourselves into. Many times I prefer to lie down, for my pains may disappear. But my ability to move about also begins to disappear, and I become very stiff. So I change my position frequently, and seldom sleep more than two hours at a time. I call it a matter of do or die, but dying isn't the alternative. Bed is—and painful sores again.

In my one-room apartment, a cupboard was lowered for me; bars were put up in different places for me to grasp. I have two lamps with switches on the base, which I can press with my canes. Wooden attachments are on the sink faucets so I can reach them. My bed looks like a studio couch with a fitted cover and quilt; and I swing myself up with a rope which is attached to a railing around the upper part. Other aids I have invented are two sticks with hooks and a "pick-up stick" like a large pair of scissors. (They are in different corners so I can get to them easily.) I also have a cane with a magnet that I use for retrieving a fallen spoon, needles and even my lipstick. Yes, I use one! I am as particular about my appearance as I am about my apartment; and even though my clothes must be slept in, fixing myself up makes me feel good.

The boy next door stops in twice a day to open or close my windows, pick up items that have fallen out of my reach, take out my garbage, put in a new light bulb. Although I cannot dress myself, a visiting nurse comes in five days a week to bathe me and change my clothes. She also opens cans and takes letters to be mailed. It was uncomfortable last summer when I had to wear damp clothes for 24 hours, but inconveniences are nothing if one makes up his mind to accept them as such!

I do my shopping by phone. Because my hands are deformed, preparing meals is difficult, but I work up an appetite doing it. I sew, also. When I put my needle into the material, I must push it on something hard to get it through, and I pull it out with my teeth. But I can shorten things and take tucks. I wash my clothes in the bathroom sink; and since I can't wring them out, they drip dry on the tub faucets. I also listen to the radio, watch TV, read and write letters.

It is a great satisfaction to be independent—and my days are made pleasant by the phone calls and visits of friends. I am fortunate, too, to have my hearing, sight and a real will to live. I even feel young. Recently my six-year-old granddaughter said, "Grandma, you are little, but not young, because you have wrinkles. Where do they come from?" I gave her the answer a famous actress once used: "I am proud of my wrinkles; they show where the smiles have been."

Sincerely,
RUTH K. HARRIS

Good Reading vs. Comics

Baltimore, Maryland

Dear Miss Brookman: May I commend the Public Affairs Department of your magazine for highlighting the reading-vigilance campaign of the General Federation of Women's Clubs and particularly that of the Junior Woman's Club of La-Platte, Nebraska. It is encouraging to read of nationwide alertness to children's reading habits since we all agree that horror comics are a serious threat.

However, some of us are truly concerned with even such a worth-while campaign as this when we see the headline "Mothers Enforce Clean-up of Comics." The National Council of Jewish Women believes that when citizen groups seek to enforce their views by pressure on newsdealers, their actions have serious censorship implications.

The Baltimore Section, N.C.J.W. rejected a local plan to put pressure on dealers to remove comics from their stands because we did not believe it necessary to run the risks of censorship in order to discourage children from reading horror comics. Instead, we worked out what we think is a more positive plan—one which places confidence in the children themselves. Our method is to substitute good reading for poor. This is what we did:

Two years ago, we established in cooperation with the Baltimore public schools a volunteer school-enrichment program, using the school library as the hub of activity. We chose school areas where the home environments were providing little or no stimulation in this direction. Where there were no school libraries, volunteers prepared them according to school specifications. Not only were book-lending services offered, but volunteers with artistic and musical aptitudes employed storytelling techniques to weave in painting and music in their programs.

The school library became fun; children look forward to the volunteer's day at school; and the teachers find that readiness for the regular curriculum is enhanced when fun reading precedes the assignments. The teacher-volunteer-child liaison is excellent.

We have never regretted our choice of enrichment work. We feel certain that what we are doing will sell more good books in years to come, and will always make the library a pleasurable place to be for the hundreds of children we have worked with.

For the long term, we hope these children will encourage their parents to cease reading the comics on the newsstands. We look to the day when parents and children together may be able to buy fine literature and worth-while magazines on the newsstands. This kind of long-range planning could very well put the horror comics out of business and create a greater demand for good literature. This kind of pressure for good reading will find the publishers

More "Burns" on Care of Aged

I lost my temper years ago over this and I have talked and talked only to have people gently change the subject. Who wants to hear about others' troubles in our fine, rich country? Thank the Lord that someone who can speak from experience has written about these dreadful conditions.

D.A.P.
Duluth, Minnesota

My aunt's care, in a series of nursing homes for six months, cost nearly $3000 under conditions that would cause a stanch vivisectionist to recoil in horror. If these scandalous conditions are so evident to the layman, what of our doctors and medical societies? Why aren't they in the fore in the care of this festering sore, the treatment of our aged?

Name and address withheld

If church, school and organizational building committees would only stand as one and say "Let's keep everything sound but simple," just think of the money that would be saved toward the supporting of all who have outgrown their usefulness to society, especially those needing bedside care. In other words, clean beds and airy rooms in place of storied, elaborate places of worship or glorified school buildings—fresh clothes and linens in place of expensive interior decoration and unnecessarily artistic plumbing! MARIAN MADDISON
Lynnfield Centre, Massachusetts

In approximately three fourths of the thirty towns and cities in Nebraska which have local councils of United Church Women, visiting nursing homes is one of their projects. The mere fact that townspeople drop in frequently is, in itself, a help in improving conditions. We hope this may suggest similar service to other volunteer groups. MRS. M. C LEONARD
President
Nebraska Council of United Church Women
Lincoln, Nebraska

The descriptive examples of neglect in the care for the aged in nursing homes is illustrative of one of the depressing problems which are constantly being studied by the New York State Joint Legislative Committee on Problems of the Aging. The appeal for laws enforcing standards of care in these homes has been recently answered in New York. Chapter 598 of the Laws of 1956 is ideal legislation designed to define the persons and their responsibilities in the maintenance of private homes for the aged. LIONEL ALAN MARKS
Legal Counsel, 14th District
The Senate, State of New York

I think it is grossly unfair to condemn all of us who run these poorly paying places because someone has not lived up to the standards set by every state and county and has not treated her patients right. Our places in California are supervised by the Welfare Department and are regularly inspected. If anyone goes into this business not loving people, or for the sake of money, I say she is a fool. About all one gets out of it is the satisfaction of knowing she is doing for some of the most neglected people on earth, American parents.

IDA CLEMENS GUYETTE
Beaumont, California

Personally, I extend a vote of thanks to the many rest-home operators who work twelve to eighteen hours a day, 365 days a year, for less money than they could earn at an ordinary job. Many are dedicated men and women who deserve the best you can offer, not a slap in the face.

MARJORIE L. HAFEN
Salt Lake City, Utah

► Miss Crosson did not intend to imply that all homes for the aged are like those she described. That far too many are, however, has been affirmed by many, many readers who have written us from all over the United States since "My Mother is in There!" appeared in the February JOURNAL. *The problem, of course, is not one which concerns boarding-home operators alone, but all Americans. WHAT DO YOU KNOW ABOUT WOMEN?

Science comes up with some surprising observations on a favorite subject

By JOHN E. GIBSON

Women may not be the most fascinating subject under the sun, but at least half the world's population seems to think so—and science appears to agree with them. Psychologists and sociologists have conducted countless surveys, tests and studies—all designed to penetrate the veil of mystery which has made women the enigmatic sex. Let's take a look at some of their most revealing findings.

QUESTION: Are women harder to get along with than men are?

ANSWER: They are. Studies show that 1—women are much harder to please than men are; 2—they are more critical of others' shortcomings; and 3—are more given to faultfinding in general. They tend to be more easily irritated and annoyed by people, situations, places and things than men.

Q: Do most women overrate themselves on their good looks and sex appeal?

A: Yes. Women tend to rate themselves higher on beauty and attractiveness than impartial judges do. This was found particularly true of women who made lower beauty scores than average. Good-looking women tended to be better adjusted than the less attractive—in that they had a better-developed sense of security, and stronger and more dominant personalities.

Q: Are women better judges of human nature than men are?

A: Though women have been found to be more critical of others than men are, they have also been found to be more accurate in their judgments of character. A woman can size up another person better—just by looking at him—than a man can. The women who proved to be the shrewdest judges were those over thirty. (Interesting to note, in this connection, that women's intuitive faculties have been found to function better than men's do.)

Q: Do good-looking girls tend to be more intelligent than the less attractive ones?

A: The brainy-intellectual type is commonly pictured as being mousy, bespectacled or otherwise unprepossessing; likewise girls of ravishing good looks (particularly blondes) are commonly conceived of as being "dumb." Science has completely exploded this popular notion. Girls who wer above average in intelligence were found t be above average in good looks.

Q: Are women harder to understan than men?

A: Literally speaking, they are. Wome speak less intelligibly than men do—thu adding weight to the oft-voiced male com plaint that it's difficult to make sense ou of what a woman is talking about. In phon conversations particularly, the jumble run-together words makes women very de initely the misunderstood sex.

Q: Are women more finicking abo their food than men are?

A: They very definitely are. Women ha a greater sensitivity of taste; if somethin doesn't taste quite right, a woman is f quicker than a man to detect it. Women a more partial to salty and sour foods.

Q: Are women more easily embarrasse

A: On the contrary, women can kee their composure under circumstances whi would cause a man's face to turn brick re Tests have shown that when a risqué sto is told in mixed company it is the men wh show the greatest tendency to blush.

Q: At what age do women have t greatest appeal to the opposite sex?

A: Where most men are concerned, woman reaches her peak of attractivene in her early twenties; "about twenty-fiv received the second greatest number votes. A man tends to be the most suscep ble to a woman's charms during two p riods in his life: 1—when he is betwe twenty and twenty-five; and 2—when is in his middle forties.

Q: Can women get along without men b ter than men can get along without wome

A: They can. Men who lose their wi are twice as likely to go "off the deep end mentally and physically, as are women w are bereft of their husbands. It was fou that the mortality rate for widowers w twice as great as for widows. Women p sess greater emotional resiliency, and are l likely than men to be driven to drink, depr sion or suicide by a broken love affair. Sp sters are far more capable of adjusting the single life than bachelors are.

Journal ABOUT TOWN

Gossip about people you know, editors you like, and what goes on in New York

FIFTY YEARS AGO IN THE JOURNAL

Ravishing Nora Bayes starred in The Follies of 1907, the first Follies ever seen in America. In May, 1907, New York saw another "first": taximeter cabs, imported from Paris, with a driver up front in the open. Song hits included I Want a Gibson Man, and George M. Cohan's Harrigan, and every small girl dreamed of owning a white Teddy bear.

The May, 1907,* JOURNAL *gives Maude Adams' reactions to her visit to a sheik's harem on the desert, tells how Luther Burbank created the Shasta daisy from the common field variety, goes backstage with Julia Marlowe in Romeo and Juliet, and reveals that Mme. Melba (The Woman with the Voice of Gold) charges William Waldorf Astor $5000 for appearing at his private parties.

"What would be proper to order for a light supper after the theater?" a reader wants to know. "Raw oysters, followed by birds, hot or cold, or else sweetbreads, lobster or crabs à la Newburg, ice cream and coffee."

"Are white shoes essential for a white wedding gown? I should prefer to wear black," writes a bride-to-be. Comments the JOURNAL, "Black would be a mistake."

"Sewing pairs of stockings together before washing them will help the busy mother, and when they have been ironed it is a great help to find them mated."

How to lose weight: A girl who reduced from 165 to 135 pounds describes her favorite year-round dinner: "Vegetable soup, broiled steak, mashed potatoes, lettuce salad with four tablespoons olive oil, and figs, dates or nuts for dessert."

In this issue, the editors deplore America's country schoolhouse—"an ugly clapboard box, with a dirt yard and outhouse, with no grass or shrubs or trees"—and urge the beautifying of such schools with plantings.

"I wish to make a bathrobe for my husband from a single blanket. Can I obtain a JOURNAL pattern?" inquires a reader. "Yes, indeed," answers Mrs. Ralston. "A blanket is just the right size."

Speaks out the JOURNAL: "A young girl should not go alone with any man, not a relative, to a public restaurant, as she lays herself open to being classed with women of undesirable reputation."

"Keep a stack of paper napkins for polishing lamp chimneys and save them for kindling fires."

ABBOT MILLS

Queen Sue and Princess Faith demonstrate their sewing prowess for Nora O'Leary.

We welcome anything in the way of a rip just to have an excuse to stand in Nora O'Leary's department next door and watch Flora Kerestedjian, Esther Wiberg and Doris Chandler at their artistry, while one of these skillful couturières indulgently descends to the level of mending our jacket. That's how we happened to encounter Carol Sue McGinnis, 14, of University City, Mo., and Faith Ascher, 13, of Brooklyn, N.Y. The two girls had come in to demonstrate their prowess to Nora and her staff, having just won the huge national junior dressmaking contest held by a big sewing-machine company. Sue had on the costume that had crowned her queen in her division, won her $1000, and Faith was wearing hers, which had made her princess of the younger girls and $500 richer as well. The talk was way over our head: "the way you matched the plaid," "all those bound buttonholes," "cam stitching," "bight control." But what a pleasure to observe the mutual respect with which real experts regard each other, amateur and professional alike.

A caller the other day informed us that he had a reservation on the fully booked first jet passenger flight from New York to Los Angeles, which will make the run in five hours. "When do you leave?" we asked. "Noon Monday, June 15, 1959." 1959! . . . Anyhow, it reminded us to phone the Hayden Planetarium and see how many people had signed up for the trip to the moon we told you about here several years ago. "Please have pity on us and forget the whole thing!" the director pleaded. "More than fifty thousand people signed up. Why, one man even called us up in all seriousness and canceled his reservation."

A letter the other day from our poetry editor, Elizabeth McFarland, in Paris with her husband Dan and small daughter Katie, tells of Katie's efforts to preserve in her parents, both of them poets, a childlike belief in elves. The purpose became apparent one evening when Dan was away overnight, and Katie said, "Mummy, I don't know whether you know it or not, but when daddy's home the elves usually leave me a little snack on the kitchen table."

While out of town recently, we received the following night letter from our dutiful assistant: "Just came from Grand Ballroom of Sheraton-Astor. Big party for a baby-products manufacturer. Jammed with 3000 expectant mothers; 500 turned away. Most having first or second. Gave up seat to one expecting ninth time! Opera singer Mimi Benzell, expecting, too, sang lullabies. Dr. Allen F. Guttmacher, expert and author Pregnancy and Birth, said: Summer months big baby months but September biggest. 5 A.M. biggest hour. If your lipstick changes color blame body chemistry. Signed, Your Assistant. P. S. Just learned am having baby myself in October."

"After writing my litterbug piece," said Betty Coe Spicer, "I'm so litter-conscious that I get bigger and bigger handbags to accommodate all the things I'm afraid now to throw away—laundry lists, old theater stubs, tissues, parking-lot checks. What did I do with them before?"

A soufflé should go to the table within five minutes after it comes from the oven or it will fall, as every woman knows. But getting everything assembled for a color picture of a soufflé sometimes takes longer. Editors wanted a photograph as hot and puffy as the soufflé will appear on your table, ready to eat—which accounts for one of the weirdest contrivances and performances we ever saw, up in the food kitchen recently. There was a vast white oxygen tent blazing with floodlights and enveloping the oven, a nearby table, Louella Shouer, and Donald Stuart behind his big camera. An assistant chosen for her steady nerves was opening the oven door, reaching in like a cat approaching a mouse, removing the burgeoning soufflé, placing it on the table as though it were a bomb; and then Stuart began his time exposures. The suspense was painful, but the beautiful soufflé stayed right up, and the picture for our Collector's Items this month was made and then the soufflé was eaten.

Sitting on picture editor Tina Fredericks' desk, Harry Belafonte quietly sang the Caribbean folk ballad he'll sing in the movie of Island in the Sun he just made—from the book first published in LADIES' HOME JOURNAL. People gathered round. "Hey! Where did they come from?" Belafonte asks Tina Fredericks, surprised by the admiring Journalites at the door.

BILL SEARS

Lalaji's youngest daughter was his most prized possession—and his most baffling problem.

by R. Prawer Jhabvala

A Prince for

Lalaji himself was the only one in the house still to sleep outdoors. He did not like his bedroom. Still, one had to keep up with one's money. A bedroom suite was a social necessity, so he had bought it. But he slept outdoors as long as he could; sometimes right up to early November.

Groaning, for he was still stiff with sleep, he heaved himself from his bed and went to sit indoors in what they called the sitting room. The sitting room had shiny English furniture, silk curtains and lamp shades, novelty cigar boxes, and colored photographs in silver frames. It was very different from what he had grown up with and got used to. However, he had very soon managed to adjust himself to his new and foreign opulence. His costly, shiny possessions did not disconcert him. Tomorrow, if he wanted to, he could throw them out and buy new ones, more expensive ones, if more expensive ones could be got.

This morning something was vaguely troubling him; he did not know what. Not the usual things—the ten-lac income-tax arrears which the government was demanding, the new deputy minister, the T—— bribery-and-corruption case, his lawyer's latest report, and the twenty-five lacs' worth of work which threatened to go to another contractor. This thing that was so surprisingly troubling him was something smaller and more personal. If only he could think what it was. . . .

A servant brought his soap and clean clothes, and he went out to wash. There were seven marble bathrooms in the house, but he preferred to wash by the garden tap and clean his teeth with a twig from the margosa tree. Afterward he prayed, very quickly and almost unconsciously. All the time this thing was nagging at him and when, back in the sitting room, the servant handed him his cup of tea, he knew what it was. It was that his wife was not there.

Drinking his tea, he thought of the small annoyances that were in store for him that day because his wife was not there. His food would not be cooked properly and he would be served by servants. But there was no help for it; he made up his mind to it and was at once reconciled. If his wife had died, he would have made up his mind to it just like that, and been reconciled. He was used to making compromises and could fashion a life for himself under any conditions. But she had not died; she had only gone to the nursing home to be with Shanta, who was expecting another child. Well, let it come; he would provide for it. As he provided for them all.

He read the newspaper to see if there was any mention of the T—— bribery-and-corruption case. There was not; only a report of a man who had been arrested for offering a five-rupee bribe to a municipal officer. He shook his head: five rupees—what did the man expect? Though there had been a time when that was all he himself could offer. From five rupees he had advanced to fifty, to five hundred, to five thousand. One had to know how to do these things.

Out of habit he looked at the marriage offers: "Wanted, for Punjabi boy, 21, wheat complexion, B.A., first-class family, a beautiful fair girl." He still had two to dispose of, Viddi and Nimmi, but there was no need for him to look at or insert advertisements. He needed only, in his own good time, to throw out a hint and all the richest men in Delhi would come eagerly forward with sons and daughters. But no hurry: the right time, the right opportunity would come. His children could have and would have the best. First he had to establish Viddi, bring him into the business, make a man of him. He frowned a little, thinking of Viddi. The boy had been talking and behaving strangely ever since he had left college. But there was nothing really to get worried about, nothing that he, as a father, did not know how to put right. And Nimmi. He did not have to frown when he thought of Nimmi. His treasure, his pride, his finest achievement. Would there ever be anyone good enough for her? A prince, he thought, a prince I will get for her. Though he did not mean it literally: he would not have liked a prince in his family.

He went to the bottom of the stairs and called, "Come down here, come down to your dada!" Om Prakash's children came tumbling down the stairs, shouting, "Dada, dada!"—two of them, a boy and a girl. He laughed out loud with pleasure.

Om could be heard grumbling in his room, then he appeared at the door, his eyes still half shut, squinting down with ill-humor at his father and his children on the stairs. Lalaji laughed and told the children, "Good, now you have got your father out of bed. All day he would sleep."

the Mountain that Fell at the Falls

"Everything's going to be all right," she said. But they both knew she was lying.

By FRANK FARNHAM

I call Faye my Wilson Falls woman now; and the strange part is not that she is one, for she wanted to be all along, but the way she became one.

My wife laughs now when I call her that, but she wouldn't have always, for although it was built of such unlikely molehills as the blue house dress, the price we paid for margarine and the birthday that hadn't happened, the mountain that rose between us and the town was a very real mountain, and we could never have scaled it had not a spark and the chair Uncle Wilbur bought before I was born brought the mountain tumbling down.

To tell how it happened, and why, one must have a starting point, and that wintry afternoon at the Hayes General Store seems as good a place as any.

"I almost forgot," I told Bill Hayes that afternoon at the store, as I put a last check mark on the grocery list, "I need a couple of pounds of margarine."

"What kind you got in mind?"

"I'll take the Kilton's Special," I said firmly, and waited for the look to come, because Kilton's Special was ten cents a pound the cheapest.

Bill's face didn't change, that time, and he moved heavily away to the rear of the store, to the refrigerator, and I walked over to the bridge game which was going on by the big-bellied iron stove.

My next-door neighbor, John Logan, was kibitzing the game. John is florid and fortyish, and raises pheasants for the state, but right then he was telling of an experience with another kind of game bird, a partridge that flew right through his legs one time, and the players had stopped playing to listen.

It was funny, the way he told it, and everyone laughed. Then one by one they noticed me standing there, taking in my heavy red plaid woolen jacket, the green woolen pants that disappeared into the tops of the heavy gray woolen socks that, in turn, vanished from view within my tan sixteen-inch rubbers. It was childish, I knew, but I wanted them to see how much I now looked like a native, even though I couldn't say what I wanted to say: "Boys, I'm sorry about what happened last fall. It was thoughtless, not intentional. I want very much to be friends. Faye and I both do."

For in Wilson Falls, you don't wear your emotions out in the open. A man can smile if he wants to, laugh if it's really funny, but he must always keep something of himself in reserve, never giving all, never accepting all—especially never in a public place.

The eyes that appraised me were neither hostile nor kindly. Finally John said, "Hello, Mr. Lothrop."

Before it happened, he had sometimes called me Roger. "Hello, John—everyone," I said. "Cold day out."

John agreed that it was. The others nodded.

I tried again. "How's Rachel feeling?" Rachel was the same age as my Linda, and had been out of school for a week with a cold.

"She's better," John said, looking away, looking down at the board which served as the playing table.

The eight eyes of the four players were again studying the cards. None, I guessed, was as expert as I. None, I was sure, loved the game more. The eyes were shrewd eyes, country-shrewd, with crow's-feet sweeping back and away from them, etched in paler channels through darkly weathered faces.

"Let's see, your bid was three diamonds, Mort, so I'll say three spades," said Ken Wyman. In the summers, he ran the ninety-room Abenaki Hotel at the lake. Mort Hanna owned the sawmill.

"Four diamonds," said Alf Judkins. He was the broiler farmer.

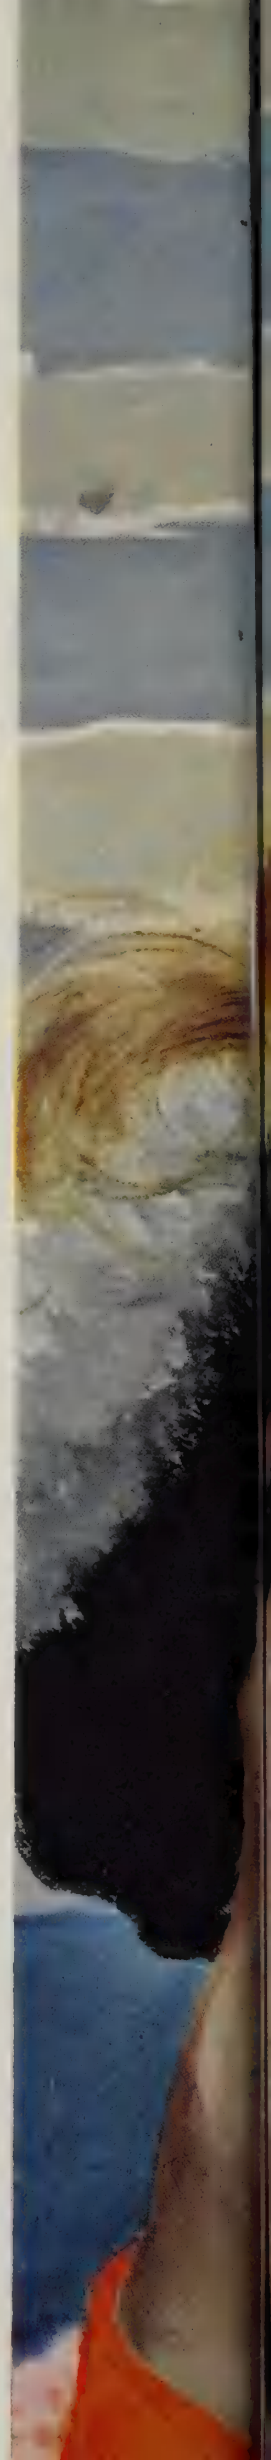
"Doubled," said Manley Pierce, grinning slyly. Manley was section foreman on the Maine Central, having his weekly day off.

The big wood stove threw out great waves of heat, waves strong enough to be visible, but the snapping heat of good birch couldn't warm me, nor could any physical kind of fire. I went back to the counter, where Bill Hayes had my groceries stacked in a cereal carton.

"How much do I owe you?"

"It comes to ten thirty-two."

"Check be all right?"



"Sure. Money's money. Pay in pennies, if you want to. Come to think of it, your Uncle Wilbur did one time."

I was writing the check out, signing my name, making the proper entry on the stub, noting the balance had just dipped below four hundred dollars.

"How many pennies?" I asked idly.

"I don't like to be pinned down, Mr. Lothrop," he said distantly. "It was more than two thousand, I remember that, and I remember what for too. It CONTINUED ON PAGE 140

The Boy in the Dream

In the daylight,
Alan could forget.
But at night,
the blurred face haunted him.
the small voice reproached him.

By LESLEY CONGER

In his dream the wind was blowing, first of all. The wind blew soundlessly and the leaves whirled on the wind-swept, rain-wept street where faces disappeared from the windows and doors like lights blown out, one by one. Then Alan could hear the little boy crying Daddy, daddy!, his voice turning on the unkind wind that snatched it from his mouth like a scrap of paper and bore it away, Daddy, daddy!, his voice searching like the harpy wind, crying Daddy, daddy! wearily and without hope. And Alan would start from his nothingness; he shivered into a terror of being, ran vainly with leaden legs, fought his strangling way through the enveloping, hell-hag wind, but could not catch the boy nor make him turn.

Then into a doorway, dark and hungerless as the open mouth of the dead, and the boy was lost and Alan was the boy, standing three decades back on the wooden platform, jostled by the children on either side, hearing Miss Falconer at the piano, seeing her bright, counterfeit smile as she mouthed to them, Now, children—and Alan, his little saccharine speech forgotten, stood there shuddering in hot shame and howling, Daddy, daddy! But in the dream no blushing, half-laughing father leaped from the front row to snatch him from the dark, warm puddle; he never dreamed that far into reality, but woke shivering, grasping with relief his present identity.

He had dreamed the dream first aboard ship a dozen years ago; he lay in a bunk that hummed with the ship's engines and dreamed the dream halfway across the Pacific. Waking, he thought, If I could tell Jean, she would laugh at me. No, not laugh at me, but smile, anyway. Then she would tell him to forget it; soberly, with the simple insistence of the kind of person she was, believing that if you had strength of character you could forget and remember at will. But for Alan the dream kept returning. And tonight, this night twelve years later when he awoke, he thought first, I knew I would have the dream again. I knew it before I went to sleep.

He moved cautiously, edging down into the bedding, conscious of Naomi asleep beside him. But she lay as always curled into her little fetal ball, her sturdy legs drawn up, knees to chest—as if it were perpetually icy winter in bed and she huddled to warm herself. Her hands made fists and her tawny hair tangled across her cheek. Even if he had cried out—as he thought he might have—she would only have stirred and slept on in that tightly locked sleep of a woman who does not listen for a child's cry in the night and has not learned to sleep lightly, half waking. But she would change. Tomorrow night would be the beginning of change, and she would soon lie cleverly, motherlike, at the very edge of sleep. Alan leaned on his elbow and looked down at her in her buried slumber. He felt bitterly alone in his dream-cast prescience of parenthood, wakening to a child's cry, even a ghost child.

A man was not supposed to feel like this. Other men joked of the brats they may have fathered; but, Alan thought, God knew what some few of them found in their hearts in a laughterless moment. As for Alan, he was haunted by his sleeping mind's picture of the responsibility he could not shoulder and the relationship he could not acknowledge. And now that they knew that Naomi could not have a child, now that they were ready to take into their home a child of unknown strangers, the dream had an acute and desperate poignancy.

The face of the boy in the dream was like one of those blurry snapshots of himself, standing self-consciously and squinting at the box camera which his father never seemed to be able to hold still enough. For Alan had never seen this son of his. He knew only that he existed, was somewhere, and was cell of his own cell, with what heritage he could give him. Perhaps the boy had his light hazel eyes and strong, stocky body, the thin, quirking mouth and the too-large nose; perhaps, even, a tendency to hay fever. Unless the other half of his parentage had worked some alchemy in combination, he was not likely to be a handsome boy—Alan himself was almost ugly.

Alan Seymour looked like a rough, hard-drinking, hard-swearing, bullish male, with no thought beyond his next drink or his next woman. He was, in fact, gentle and somewhat bookish—a joke, Jean had said, upon people who judged others by their faces. People like herself, she might have said—but she had taken the joke handsomely, with mild surprise.

Jean was a big, lusty, laughing girl, a kind and clean girl into whose arms Alan had gone in the weary war years, seeking nothing more complex than the warm comfort of love-making. Nearly five months after he had last seen her, she had written to him at Camp Pendleton in an almost illiterate scrawl and he had met her at Oceanside, in front of the beach hotel. It was cold; she wore a loose, gray coat and her hair was tied in a red wool kerchief. Her face was drawn and a little tired, but she still smiled, even if ruefully. They walked back and forth on the sand in the chill wind, talking.

"I wasn't going to tell you," Jean said, "but I can't work any more and I'm nearly flat broke. So, you being the kind of guy you are, I had to come to you. If I had a family, believe me, I'd just go home."

There was only one thing that came to Alan to say. He said CONTINUED ON PAGE 149

Weekend the C

Phoebe had arranged the right setting for Bryan to propose, but the wrong man came into it.

He looked at her hand.
"Are you engaged . . . or something?"

By SUE KAUFMAN

The West Side Drive was filled with a solid slow-moving mass of cars, and it looked more like a Saturday morning in August than the second Saturday in October that it was. Phoebe, an impatient foot on the accelerator, began to accept the dismal fact that she would never make Stamford and the Moores' house by lunchtime. There would be two empty places at the table. She knew very well that out of sheer consideration she ought to have called Jeannie before leaving and told her that Bryan wouldn't be coming up at all, but she couldn't have endured Jeannie's remarks over the phone: "Oh, how mean—not again?" or "Phoebe, you just shouldn't let him break so many dates!"

The line of cars she was in moved a few feet, then stopped, so she looked out toward the Hudson River. In the next lane, two cars ahead, was a little red foreign car much like the black one Bryan had bought last month. When he'd first told her about buying it, she had been miserable. For weeks they had been going out for inexpensive "budget" evenings, and he'd incessantly talked about economies, the cost of living, how hard it was for young people to get married nowadays—always oblique talk with "you" and "me" carefully kept out of it—and then he'd gone and bought the car. It was only when she forced herself to see it that she realized that for Bryan such a car was an absolute necessity.

She knew it was strange of her to be so in love with a man that she'd lost nearly all her pride, yet at the same time to have acquired a detached, almost cruelly critical opinion of him. But a part of Bryan was his pose, and she saw it. His careful clothes, the little Italian car, his right-address apartment that he shared with the unpleasant boy in publishing, his very manner—all were little more than a set of symbols duplicated by so many other young men like him. Bryan was in advertising. And she'd be willing to bet that the man in the red car was in advertising too. It was funny, because the back of the driver even looked like Bryan: dark crew cut, sunburned neck, wide tweed-covered shoulders—just the likeness got her heart going. But even if she knew a part of Bryan was consciously phony, it got her nowhere. She still felt the same about him, and if last night he hadn't told her he had to go up to Old Lyme, to Blodgett's—his boss'—house, instead of coming to the Moores' with her as planned, she would not be so miserable. It was the third time in two weeks that he'd broken a date with her at the last moment—but she took it and would go on taking it. He'd even promised to call her at the Moores' tomorrow, perhaps drive down from Old Lyme for the afternoon. So that would have to be enough, wouldn't it? Yes, she agreed wearily, it would.

Her car had rolled with the line, and she was now directly next to the little red car. The profile of the driver was opposite her, and looking at it she almost laughed. How typical of an infatuated woman to see likeness to her man everywhere! Here was a longish nose instead of Bryan's pointed proud one, a big mouth instead of Bryan's well-cut lips. . . . To her embarrassment the profile suddenly turned, big brown eyes looked dead into hers and blinked.

Mortified, she turned away. "Phoebe? Isn't it Phoebe Markham?" she heard him say, but luckily at that moment there was a break in the traffic and she moved quickly away. She did not know him, or want to know him, and had no idea how he knew her name. She shrugged it off, convinced that it was all part of the morning's unpleasantness. When she hit the parkway the traffic really broke, and she raced the motor, eager to make up for the time she had lost and reach the Moores'.

An hour later she turned off the parkway, down a country road, finally entering the long rutted lane that led to the house of her best friend's family. The car moved into sunlight and the Moores' house loomed in front of her, large, sprawling, grown over with ivy, and windows open to the hot autumn day—and she felt suddenly happy and at peace, as though she had come home at last. As she climbed out of the car she heard the distant snip-snip of garden shears, meaning that Mr. Moore was at his favorite hobby again, and from somewhere inside a jazz tune groaned—Sammy, Jeannie's seventeen-year-old brother, was playing his phonograph. When she rang the doorbell there was a loud thumpety-thump from upstairs, Sammy shouted, "Hey, stupid, get the door! I'm not dressed!" and a moment later Jeannie appeared at the door in a tie-silk robe, a towel wound turban fashion about her pretty blond hair.

"Phoebe . . . oh, what a mess! I just washed my hair and it's all wet! Bryan will think I'm ——" She blinked at the empty air next to Phoebe. "Where is Bryan?"

Phoebe marched firmly past Jeannie into the house. "He couldn't come. He had to go up to his boss's in Old Lyme. It was unexpected and he really had to go." Her voice trailed off under Jeannie's all-knowing eyes.

"Oh, dear. Peter's arriving after lunch," Jeannie apologized. They had planned the weekend carefully: Jeannie had invited Peter Ackerson, a young architect, the all-important man in her life, and Phoebe had invited Bryan. Both of them had hoped for the romantic effects of a weekend in the country.

Phoebe smiled crookedly. "He said he might be able to drive down tomorrow afternoon. I'm sorry—I'm going to be an awful third wheel."

"Third wheel!" muttered Jeannie and, picking up Phoebe's bag, led the way upstairs to the large sun-filled room they always shared.

While Phoebe unpacked, washed up, combed her wind-blown short dark hair, and changed into gray flannel shorts, Jeannie sat on the bed brushing her blond hair dry, chattering about Peter. Although she and Phoebe both lived and worked in New York, they didn't have much chance to talk during the week, and it seemed that in the past week things had progressed for Jeannie and Peter. He wanted her to come down to Virginia to meet his mother and father. Phoebe was glad that things were at least working out for Jeannie; strangely enough, this beautiful girl had always had miserable luck with the men she'd loved.

"Phoebe . . . do you think he'll ask me when we're down there?"

She felt a tug of envy. "Yes, I think."

The door burst open and long-legged, skinny Sammy, his blond hair over one eye, said, "Hi, Feeb! . . . Listen, dolls, save the talk—lunch is on!"

Walking into the dining room with its wide windows looking out over smoky distance, its table set with flawless glass and china, Phoebe was pained. This was what she'd wanted Bryan to see. Graciousness—and her in its setting.

Mr. and Mrs. Moore were sitting at opposite ends of the long table. Mr. Moore, with his ruddy round face, jolly dark eyes behind horn rims, and his shock of bushy gray hair, looked the picture of a contented burgomaster. But the broad, deceptively placid brow fronted a mind which had made him one of the most celebrated criminal lawyers in the country. Mrs. Moore, a pretty, plump woman, with Jeannie's fair hair and a warm, witty face, had once been a lawyer herself, and knew as much

THE 1729 HOUSE CALLE

By RICHARD PRATT

Architectural Editor of the Journal

You step down from the hallway of the high main section of the house into the dining room (in the middle wing) with its intimate-breakfast table in front of the great flat-arched fireplace. The corner staircase leads to the master bedroom above, while through the open door you get a glimpse of the beautifully traditional yet functionally modern kitchen with its remarkable collection of cooking molds.

OLMELAND, IN SALEM COUNTY

Through the antique Venetian blind the South Jersey sunlight filters into the parlor, whose Georgian stylishness has been restored with affectionate regard for the inherent charm of the old house by its present owners, Dr. and Mrs. A. Ralston Green, who have not let their knowledge and skill as collectors lead them away from an essential livableness.

From one of the two bedrooms, with its mellow pine-paneled wall, tall four-poster and colorful South Jersey quilt, you look across the hall and down into the master bedroom in the middle wing above the dining room.

The landscape of this county is ever so gently undulating where it lies back from the broad tidewaters of the Delaware, and in the neighborhood of Holmeland here, a region of rare old red-brick manor houses, you can generally spot one of them from far away across the fields, standing up like this one, tall, erect and rather urban Georgian in character, and somewhat like an English town house left out in this very American countryside. It was not at all difficult deciding on Holmeland to represent the region, for besides being one of the handsomest houses here, it had been restored and furnished not only as a treasure from the past but as a pleasure for the present. During the Revolution British raiders from the river ransacked it and set it on fire. Though the house itself was saved, all of its furnishings were removed, as was the custom, and never recovered. Even so, the house today looks better than it ever did before.

When you marry, you naturally try to pick out a partner who will meet your emotional needs. If you want your marriage to last, it is equally important to ask yourself, "Am I willing and able to meet his own emotional needs?" You are not likely to understand what his needs are, unless you know him (preferably also his family) pretty well before you become engaged. After marriage, husbands and wives should ask themselves at least once a month, "Am I sure that I know what he (or she) really wants out of marriage, and am I providing for these wants?" If you know what the wants are, and deliberately refuse to provide for them, you are guilty of emotional nonsupport, an offense almost as serious as financial nonsupport! Counselors at the American Institute of Family Relations often have to help people understand the needs of their partners. They may have even more difficulty getting people to take the necessary action to meet those needs. The counselor in this case was Samuel D. Gilbert.

PAUL POPENOE, Sc.D., General Director

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

SHE: "Jack is a confirmed hypochondriac, gloomy, spiritless, and opposed to anything that's fun. I've tried not to be impatient with him, but it's awfully hard to be sympathetic. Our doctor says there is nothing wrong except that he is low in energy and drive."

HE: "Paula won't take care of herself when she's sick and she interprets any nervous ailment as a sign of weakness and lack of character. She has subjected me to almost intolerable pressures."

PAULA TELLS HER SIDE:

"Frankly, I didn't know my husband had enterprise enough to become interested in another woman," said thirty-eight-year-old Paula, whose jaw was firm; her honey-colored hair shone in the sunlight. "On a Saturday night three weeks ago I found out my mistake. Jack announced he wanted a divorce and then told me he was in love with somebody else. I was angry and hurt, but mostly I was surprised.

"The fact is I had just about decided to ask for a divorce myself, and I thought Jack would take considerable persuading. There wasn't any other man in my picture of the future. What I had in mind was striking out on my own with our twin daughters. I meant to leave the apartment and major furnishings for Jack, and I knew I could support myself without the help of alimony. Until a couple of years ago I worked regularly—except for the period when Janis and Betty were very small. I realized I might eventually get around to thinking about a second marriage, but I didn't plan to be in any hurry. I was too afraid I might pick a second husband like my first.

"Jack is gloomy, spiritless, and generally opposed to anything that's fun. He is also a confirmed hypochondriac, and this places a heavy burden on me. We got our apartment at a tremendous bargain because we promised to be responsible for the upkeep. I took the promise seriously. I keep the apartment papered and painted and I make all necessary repairs. The smell of paint upsets Jack's stomach, and if he picks up a hammer he invariably hits his thumb. Once his thumb got infected. Wallpapering also makes him sick—he says it's the smell of the paste. I guess I'm not allergic. I've done everything from laying the kitchen linoleum to screening the back porch.

"In the beginning I was as poor at handling tools as Jack. To get over my awkwardness I enrolled in night classes at a trade high school. I was the only woman in the course. After I learned simple carpentry, the instructor suggested that I take up fine cabinetwork. I was afraid of being injured by the power tools—I was downright terrified of both the lathe and the electric saw—but I was unwilling to admit it. Eventually I conquered my nervousness and became quite an expert. Last Christmas I made matching Honduran-mahogany desks for our daughters. The local newspaper published pictures of the twins at their desks.

"Jack didn't buy any Christmas presents at all. He meant to, but he wasn't able to face the shopping crowds. When he tried, he caught a cold and spent the entire holiday season flat on his back. I bought daddy's presents for Janis and Betty; the twins are twelve years old, just the age when Christmas counts. I set up the tree, decorated it, and had to run the Santa Claus show by myself.

"I've tried not to be impatient with Jack, but it's awfully hard to be sympathetic. Our family physician has put him through every conceivable test. There is nothing wrong, the doctor says, except that Jack is low in energy and drive. Jack swallows vitamins like jelly beans, but comes home from work so exhausted he can barely totter to the sofa. At dinnertime he usually revives and can bring himself to eat an adequate meal. If I suggest a movie after dinner, he promptly has a sinking spell. It's been months since we've been to the theater. What really drives me distracted is that he seems to expect illness instead of health. If we are invited to a dinner party a week in advance, he refuses because he doesn't know how he will be feeling a week ahead.

"One of the doctor's recommendations to Jack was that he develop outside interests. I've done my utmost to help. Several years ago he decided to take up flying. Because of the danger and the expense, I wasn't wildly enthusiastic about the idea, but I kept my objections to myself. I went further. To encourage Jack, I took flying lessons too. I still maintain my pilot's license and fly every month. Jack's interest in flying quickly petered out. He belonged to the Civil Air Patrol for a while, but dropped out some time ago.

"Outdoor exercise has been strongly recommended to Jack. He won't take walks, he won't swim; he thinks tennis is for sissy kids and golf is an old man's game. Six months ago when he informed me that he had joined the company baseball team I was delighted. Jack didn't join the team as a player. He was put in charge of arranging transportation, buying and keeping track of the equipment, seeing that the tickets were printed, and so on. None of it sounded like outdoor exercise to me, but I was pleased just the same.

"I don't recall exactly when I noticed that his baseball duties were taking an unusual amount of time. He was gone nearly every weekend. More than once I was tempted to ask questions, but I restrained myself. Jack doesn't like to be cross-examined—sometimes he broods for days while I wonder what on earth the matter is—and I dislike acting like a prosecuting attorney. Too much pride, I guess.

"But let's get back to that Saturday night. I won't deny that Jack's request was a blow to my vanity, although I managed not to show it. To my way of thinking, he hadn't done too badly in our CONTINUED ON PAGE 198

SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS (1723-1792)

Reynolds was the only important artist in history who believed that to become a great painter it is not necessary to have talent. Genius for him was a matter of hard work, following the rules and above all profiting from the examples set by the great painters of the past. As a young "face painter" he went to Italy and, ignoring his personal tastes, he made a careful study of those old masters who had appealed most consistently to the public over the years.

He copied details from their best-known works and compiled a kind of reference file illustrating the ways they posed their models, what features of the face should CONTINUED ON PAGE 185

Five years ago Vassar decided to find out, by scientific methods, what girls get out of four years at college. A research team composed of three psychologists and an anthropologist, headed by Dr. Nevitt Sanford, professor of psychology at the University of California, was given an absolutely free hand. Five freshman classes and four senior classes have been studied intensively. Today's students and graduates have been compared with those of twenty-five and fifty years ago.

IS COLLEGE EDUCATION

Many college girls don't want what a higher education is supposed to offer, survey revealed. Herewith some peppery comments from our readers.

By NEVITT SANFORD, Ph.D.

It is no news that there are and always have been women students who go through four years of college without being appreciably influenced by their academic work. Our research at Vassar has, I believe, thrown some new light on this problem. This research is, primarily, a study of how and why students change as they go through college. It has sought to find means by which college education might be made more effective. The difficulties, the problems, have come in for more attention than the successes and happy endings.

It is generally assumed in this country that the more education, the better. We have come to look on college in much the same way that we used to look on high school. Our kids will go if we can afford it and if they can get in. What else, indeed, are we to do with an 18-year-old girl who is not needed at home, and who is not yet ready for marriage? The inevitable result has been that thirst for knowledge does not rank very high among the motives that girls have for going to college.

They go, a great many of them, because it is "the thing to do"; because not to have gone will be a social handicap. They go to make friends, to "learn how to get along with others." They go to meet eligible young men. And, therefore, they are likely to choose the college that has the most social prestige.

I am not saying that girls ought not to have these benefits. I am asking whether they might be had in some way that is less expensive. Nor am I saying that higher education ought to be limited to an intellectual elite. I am calling attention to the fact that being among the intellectual elite, as far as ability is concerned, is no guaranty that a girl will have scholarly interests or get much out of college.

College teachers recall, or imagine, the "good old days" prior to the First World War; the days when girls who went to college were a pretty special group, out to change the world. They were out to show what women could do; at the least, to prepare themselves for careers that required special training. Figures from the Bureau of Labor Statistics confirm our own observations that a smaller and smaller proportion of college girls today want to prepare themselves for professional work. The marriage age for college women moves steadily lower. In Vassar of 1904 the average age at the time of marriage was 29. This year's seniors, on the average, expect to be married by 23; the freshmen hope to be wives by 22.

Feminism is dead, and probably few will mourn its passing. But in the absence of the strong motives which it generated, and in a culture in which merely being intellectual does not cut much ice, it is difficult for girls to stick to high intellectual purposes.

Psychology and psychiatry have contributed their share to the notion that the best way for a girl to show that she is healthy, wholesome, mature, well adjusted and the like is to get married and have children. We should not be surprised if many girls have drawn the conclusion that the sooner this is accomplished, the better. Many neglect their self-development in favor of what they suppose the young men want. In the list of imagined qualities, being intellectual or "brainy" does not rank very high.

The college of today, then, has its work cut out for it. The residential college in particular selects students carefully, and regards flunking them out as a misfortune for all concerned. It takes considerable responsibility for the motivations and all-round well-being of the students, as well as for their intellectual diet. Thus it tries hard to interest students, to show them the satisfactions of learning, to instill a system of values in which the free use of one's mind looms large.

Here the greatest obstacle, according to our observations, is what might be called the student culture. This is a pattern of values, attitudes, ideas, ways of looking at things, rules of conduct and the like which prevails among the students at a college at any particular time. It is shaped to some extent by what students bring with them from their homes and communities and by what is the going thing in our society at large. But this student culture has an existence of its own and is passed on from one student generation to the next. The major concern of the entering freshman is with acceptance by her fellow students; her highroad to acceptance is by fitting in with the prevailing culture.

The student culture that we have observed at Vassar may have some unique features, but we have good reason to believe it is similar to what may be found in most leading women's colleges today. Some of the major features of this culture are the following:

Toward one another students are expected to be friendly, co-operative, pleasant. Toward the faculty, polite, dutiful, impersonal. The college work is to be taken seriously, but not too seriously. Frivolity is discouraged; but outstanding scholarly work, though tolerated, is not applauded. The emphasis is on moderation, keeping everyone on the same level of behavior and accomplishment. If a student thinks too much or talks too much, if she is either too indifferent or too ambitious, the student culture has effective means for bringing her into line.

"In the old days when capable helpers would live in the house, work long hours for $10 or $15 a week, women could be free for intellectual pursuits. Nowadays someone has to diaper the baby, watch the toddlers and prepare the food. The girls know it's going to be them, unless they can pay out often more than they net by working, often to inferior help. Planning a career — unless they refuse motherhood — just means frustration."
M. J. D.

"The idea that it doesn't take as much intelligence, education and all-round wisdom to raise a family successfully as to have a successful 'career' is just silly."
S. C. R.

"Let's face it, most females between 18 and 25 are out to get a chap."
F. M. P.

WASTED ON WOMEN?

"This raises the whole man-woman question. My son, a Yale senior, has only one 'must' qualification for a wife — she must never, but never, bore him."
L. F.

With respect to ideas and issues, the thing is to be pen-minded and noncontroversial, above all to avoid npleasantness. If an ethical decision has to be made, ıe proper course is to find out what others think.

The student culture largely determines for the enter- g freshman what her attitudes shall be toward dating ıd interest in young men, and these are contrary to hat one might think. For, though most of the girls press a desire to get married very soon after gradua- on and most of them do, the actual interest they take men as such is in reality fairly limited. To "fit in," om the student culture standpoint, calls for a certain nount of dating. But the code frowns on "too much" ıting or taking men too seriously.

Young men are valued not so much for themselves for the status they give a girl in the campus commu- ty. The aim is to be able to speak freely and confi- ntly of the dates one has had. What the man was like, hether or not the girl enjoyed his company, is not so ıportant. Sophomores and juniors have frequently ld us that they date less than they did as freshmen. t seemed to be expected then." Having proved their ›ility to date, the girls feel that now they can relax, ıd not accept invitations if they don't feel like doing so. terest in men is revived among seniors as graduation ıd an end to the security of the student days approach.

There are, of course, exceptions to the dating pat- rn. Here they fall generally into two types. One type nsists of girls who have come to college for the pur- se of making a good marriage, in the social and eco- mic sense; plus gaining the prestige of being known a Vassar girl. These girls usually find the college rk very hard and drop out during or at the end of e second year, having already gained what they wanted t of college.

The girls who make up the other type tend to be su- rior scholars. They are either engaged or deeply in e, but do not feel they must sacrifice their own indi- ualities or their aims for a career if they wish to marry. ith these girls we do not get the impression, as we with so many, that interest in men and in marriage a kind of defense against intellectual development. eir interest in some particular man is real. At the ne time, it does not interfere with their education. One of the main functions of the student culture is to ep the faculty at a respectful distance. It serves as a eld to prevent any deep involvements with courses or as, or any adult relationship with faculty members ıt might threaten the girls' satisfaction with them- ves as they are or with the views they already have.

At any given time, a majority of the girls are accept- ing the student culture and participating in it more or less fully. Only a small minority succeed in remaining entirely aloof. Those whose outlook is quite different from that of the majority tend to drop out of college in the first two years. This is not to say that academic work plays no part. Most students are interested, even enthusiastic, about at least some of their courses and academic achievements. Many freshmen worry a great deal about their ability to keep up, especially those who come directly from public high school. The stu- dent body in general are not indifferent to academic work or unaffected by it. But, except for a minority, the philosophy and aims of the college are not the major influences in the formation of values and habits of life.

For the greater number, the student culture is the prime educational force at work. They use it as a guide- post for getting along with fellow students; for their thinking about men, marriage, and the world in gen- eral; for dealing with the faculty in such a way as to withstand their influence, yet keep relations pleasant. It makes up the central core of values and attitudes to which the students' academic experiences are assimilated.

It will be clear, then, that the task of the faculty is a very difficult one. The materials they would mold are pretty resistant to begin with. The competing influ- ences, that would mold the materials in a different way, are formidable. Yet there is no doubt that by the time they have completed four years at Vassar, students in general have changed in ways that the college desires. Our tests show that seniors, as compared with fresh- men, have more knowledge of their cultural heritage and more highly cultivated tastes and interests. They have greater mental flexibility, greater capacity to sus- pend judgment until the facts are known, greater toler- ance and understanding toward others. They have more insight into themselves, more awareness of inner life. They are more independent and nonconforming, more self-confident, more realistic. And so on.

But nobody claims that the college's batting average is high enough. For that matter, no one knows for sure just how much these changes are due to the college and how much to natural growth. And the fact remains that differences among seniors are large: some have made enormous gains of the sort just described; in others—a great many—the gains have been slight.

But now comes the dilemma for the girl with whom college has "taken." We find that many seniors are thrown into a state of confusion and anxiety. They

"A distinguished analyst says 'men are basically hostile to the intelligent woman,' and 'Men cannot stand competition from women.' Simone de Beauvoir points out that the real problem is to educate men. If we can't do that, then the whole move for women's emancipation and education should never have been made."

THAT VERY SPECIAL TRIP

Cross-country or across the seven seas, clothes that are good travelers are the ones you bring home saying, "What would I have done without that?" Ask any experienced traveler and her first word will be "jersey" or "knitted wool." Even if not worn at the take-off, its warmth is needed in the Rockies or the Alps, on a cool day in London, Edinburgh or San Francisco. For hot-weather departures and destinations, the silk suit or jacket dress is vital and with changes becomes a "little wardrobe" in itself.

Slim sheathlike dresses take the least room in your suitcase, whisk out, hang up and can be slipped into most easily without petticoat complications. Flat pleated skirts and box jackets are easy packers too. The little black dress in silk crepe is back in fashion—unthinkable to go anywhere without it. Chiffon is at the height of its glory—makes you feel relaxed and feminine. Travel-light additions: cashmere sweaters, a crownless black leghorn hat, silk turbans and scarves, flower wreaths, sandals with ribbon-thin straps. Travel colors? Gray, beige, black and white—but don't deny yourself the fun of red, blue, pale yellow. They do co-ordinate. This wardrobe weighs in at 30 pounds.* You can add or subtract depending on your plans.

*Giving you ample allowance for lingerie, cosmetics, and so on.

Vacationers' delight

This wardrobe was designed for vacationers on the go. It travels well—from the easy comfort of the designs to the easy care of the fabrics. The lovely blue Orlon-and-wool cape is a topper for everything. It combines with its matching skirt, to look like a suit. The blue-and-white polka-dot Arnel-jersey spectator dress comes out of a suitcase without a wrinkle and can be washed and drip-dried overnight. The pink-and-white Dacron and cotton is an enchanting afternoon dress; it, too, washes and needs only a touch-up of a travel iron. The yellow Arnel-sharkskin dress (lovely under the blue cape) has a crisp finish that resists dirt. The white sweater of nylon and wool is waist-length, has three-quarter sleeves. If you don't have time to knit it before your vacation, take the yarn and directions and make it en route. The wardrobe itself is complete enough for a stay of a week or a month. You will find the very same, or similar, fabrics in the fabric department of your favorite store.

THE DURABLE FIRE

By HOWARD SWIGGETT

Stephen Lowry understood every reason why he should not go to meet Jim Peale . . . but he knew the one reason he had to.

SYNOPSIS OF PARTS I AND II. After years of Government service abroad, Stephen Lowry returned to New York with his lovely Estonian wife, Rosalie, whom he had met during the war. He accepted a vice-presidency at Continental Industries Corporation, headed by Edward Rutledge, but at first was less interested in C.I.C. than in writing a book he and Rosalie called "Principal Errors." Soon, however, he became absorbed in big business and in the rivalry among his fellow officers—Peale, Evans, Hewett and Curtis—for the position Tom Johnson would vacate when Rutledge retired and Johnson became chairman in his stead. Lowry thought his old friend Jim Peale seemed much too anxious for the promotion, and much too attracted to Rosalie. He also worried about Peale's secretive behavior during C.I.C.'s negotiations to buy another company, Larus; Lowry suspected Peale had unethically "bought" information about the company from Dolly, Lowry's unscrupulous brother.

In Paris on business, Lowry enjoyed a reunion with Rosalie's brother, Armas Lainvee—the only Lainvee besides Rosalie who had escaped the horrible invasion of Tallin by Russian troops in 1940. Later, talking with Daran, a business associate from Caracas, Lowry learned facts that indicated Peale might have embezzled money from C.I.C. Shocked, he cabled Peale he was flying immediately to New York.

That day Rosalie, happy over a successful house-hunting venture, was startled by a visit from Peale. Pale and distraught, he revealed his infatuation for her, and his fear that Lowry was returning because Daran had repeated the vicious lie Peale had told him in Caracas: that Rosalie, during the invasion of Tallin, had been the willing mistress of the Russian commander.

III

On the plane Lowry was the prey of bitter depression. It was an article of his faith to scorn advice if he was going to do something, however generous or quixotic, for someone. But here he had to do something to someone and he would have welcomed the advice of anyone who could show him a way to avoid it. All the way west, he ransacked his mind to find some explanation of the transfer that was not a guilty one, or some way he could avoid being the agent of his friend's ruin. It was selfish, doubtless, to consider himself, but this ugly business, like a spreading blot on clean paper, would stain all the happiness of his life. A hostile occupying power would be in possession of Rosalie's and his life together for how long he did not know.

So, also, Rosalie felt as she caught a glimpse of him through the customs window at Idlewild. She ran to throw her arms around him and kiss him, and tired travelers smiled a little at the pleasant sight. He seemed to her half aloof and distrait even when he kissed her.

"You're alone?" was the first thing he asked.

"Yes."

They walked arm in arm to the car the company had sent her out in, and as he looked back for his porter she said, "Darling, I know there's some trouble about Jim and something he's done. Don't let it spoil your coming home to me."

"How do you know?"

"He came to the apartment. He was very upset. He didn't say what it was except it was something in Caracas that could be put right. Is that what it is?"

"Well, it's in Caracas. I hope it can be put right."

"It's nothing affecting you and me directly?"

"Of course not," he said, kissing her again.

Oh, she thought, now the skies can fall and I will shoulder them.

"But if it's what it looks like, it will be ghastly for all of us and ruin for Jim. Dear, it looks as though he had embezzled fifty thousand dollars from the company."

"Oh," she gasped, "I had no idea! Why, while he was there Mr. Johnson came and no one would have known anything was the matter."

"Let us hope I'm wrong. It's always possible: If I am not, I have the horrible duty of accusing and ruining him. It's almost more than I can stand to think of——"

"What will you do first?"

"Oh, see him at once and give him every chance."

His baggage was stowed in the trunk and they got into the car, Lowry pressing the release of the window which shut them off from the chauffeur.

"Our new house isn't far from here," Rosalie told him. "I wanted you to see it on the way in. I suppose now that's spoiled too. It's a precious place. What do you think?"

He shook his head bitterly. "I don't think I can. This is really so ghastly."

"It's all right. I understand. Tell me how the children sounded."

They tried to talk of the children, and Armas and their old haunts in Paris, and the new house, but it was an effort, the end of which led constantly back to Peale.

In the apartment they kissed for a moment, standing in the bedroom, and then he sat down to dial Peale's number.

"Sandwich? Some coffee?" she whispered.

"After I have a shower and a change of clothes," he said, and then, "Jim, I've just arrived. I'd like to come to see you, if it's ——" He stopped short of the word "agreeable" and fumbled for another.

"Come ahead."

"I'll be there in about half an hour."

"I'll still be here in an hour," Peale answered.

When Lowry was ready to go, Rosalie kissed him and said, "Darling, I know how terrible this may be for you. All my heart goes with you."

He held her to him a moment. "It worries me," he said, "that someone from the company may call you. I don't want anyone to know I've gone directly there until I'm sure there's no solution of it. Can you stand not answering the phone if it rings?"

"Yes, I won't answer."

Peale was alone in his apartment when Lowry reached there. He came to the door, tall and straight, gray flannel trousers well pressed, a fresh white shirt unbuttoned at the collar, street shoes polished. His thin, serious face had its spiritual look, and a lock of dark hair, usually smoothly brushed, fell across his forehead. He said, "I almost forgot and said I was glad to see you."

"I am glad to see you," Lowry replied with a pat on the shoulder. They walked into the living room full of beautiful things, with the painting of Evelyn and the children looking down from over the fireplace.

"Do you want a drink? There's still some unpaid-for liquor in the apartment. I've let the servants go."

"Of course not," Lowry said, drawing a long breath. "Look, can you tell me straight off that there's nothing wrong in this Morval thing and that I've made a great fool of myself? You must know how terribly I feel about it."

"If you feel so terribly, couldn't you have given me some chance to fix it? Did you have to cable, did you have to rush back here?"

"Then it is true?"

"It's true that I took the money. Are you going to Rutledge about it?"

A WORLD

At the time of his seventh birthday, Ben was learning to read, but writing was impossible. "There seemed to be no way to teach him to hold a pencil."

By Lou Myrtis Vining

The day was July 24, 1951. The taxi driver whistled across Fifth Avenue. My husband, our seventeen-year-old son and I held our breath. "What's that address again?" the driver asked.

"Four hundred East Thirty-fourth Street," I answered. "The Institute of Physical Medicine and Rehabilitation."

The monumental granite structure came into sight. A spray of sound marked the river on our left. Sunlight fired the shaft of the Empire State Building. Three or four men, a basket of peaches and a green-tinged bottle outlined windows in the tenements that rounded the corner. But the institute was shining new.

My husband and I were quiet as we supported Ben, who could not walk. Would this building light new lamps for us, open new doors for our cerebrally palsied son?

"Won't you be seated?" The girl at the reception desk had a ramrod back. "We must confirm the appointment."

Nurses and patients hurried by. Memory traced statistics again—seven cerebrally palsied infants born each year in every 100,000 of population. I reached into my purse and drew out Dr. George Deaver's letter in answer to my inquiry about bringing Ben to the institute.

Certain sentences caught my attention: "There is no value in what a person has in his head—it is only what he can get out of the head which has a salable value. . . . If you can bring Ben to New York for a week, I will be glad to evaluate his physical, mental, social and vocational possibilities."

The receptionist said, "Take Ben to the third floor. Use the wheel chair to the left."

We moved slowly down the hall and entered the elevator. As it moved upward, I was remembering the world outside.

Episodes, sharp, clear, flashed in front of me—days, nights, towns, cities, railroad journeys in between. Suddenly I was seeing the sun on the Lost Mountains. Ben and his brothers laughing over their quiz game. The polished speed of the elevator seemed to intensify these pictures of our family life, the world we had tried to give our son.

I remembered Saturday, November 11, 1933. From the windows of the Nan Travis Hospital in Jacksonville, Texas, I watched the fog seep into the middle Texas hollows and recalled a line from W. B. Yeats: "And the mountain and woods have their day, have their day."

Fog was having its day, I thought, and the pains were growing almost unbearable. Yet the mind, always stubborn, was sending thoughts inappropriate to the pain. Instead of the baby about to be born, I thought suddenly of the yellow gourds and plum blossoms of a Texas spring and that now, in the fall, black haw was ripening deep on Blue Branch.

Screams from the next room pierced the air. "Oh, God!" The voice was strange, weird. "Oh, God, they've killed my baby!"

"What?" I jumped up in bed.

"Her son was just killed in an automobile accident," the nurse answered.

Her son was dead; and my son, Bennett Vining Pinckney, in that moment was born, before our family physician, Dr. J. M. Travis, reached the hospital room.

Ben's life, his battle for survival, became my life, my chance of survival too.

My husband, whose name signed the American Constitution, had not weathered the depression; nor had our marriage. Ben cannot remember his life for a month in the hospital incubator, the respirator, skilled hands doing all that could be done for a premature, three-pound infant. He cannot remember my tears upon the pillow as I begged the doctor over and over, "Please, doctor, please don't let my baby die."

The doctor worked on and Ben did not die. Finally Doctor Travis said, "You can take your baby home, but his life hangs on a thread. Even if he lives, his chances are not good."

Ben cannot remember my mother's tall farmhouse, the patches of peaches and pine trees in Middle Texas. There was no understanding in his eyes when for six months mother and I stood beside his electrically wired clothesbasket to sing "Rockaby, baby"; or when Paul, his brother only fourteen months older, gilded the hour with cries of "Chicky Locky, Chicky Locky" from the clean sand of the side yard. But at leas Ben could not feel the cold of that bitter Texa winter.

Fireplaces heated the farmhouse, and ho ashes from the dying logs heated the bottle tha the doctor directed be given to Ben every hou of the day and night for six months.

Besides Ben, there were all the farm duties o a Texas spring and winter—possums to chas from the tomato-hotbed flues, droopy lantern to light my brother Minyard's way to the col frame.

My mother and I would stand by Ben' clothesbasket and hear my sister-in-law, Callie call, "Hurry up, Paul, and you can go to Sunda school with me"; or, "How would you like som good warm milk fresh from the cow?"

Paul, eyes big with wonder, took small notic of the improvised incubator or its small occu pant.

In June, when Ben was seven months old, approached my mother: "Nonie, there are doc tors somewhere who must see Ben. I can go bac to teaching if you will come along to take care o the boys."

Nonie smiled. "Where will you teach?"

"I'll answer an ad." We both laughed.

I answered a West Texas ad, and M. D. Lakey superintendent of Fabens, Texas, El Pas County schools, wired me to come for an inter view at the Baker Hotel in Dallas.

Two babies and three depression years ha depleted my wardrobe. The only costume left in tact and unworn was a pair of Russian-styl lounging pajamas. I also had an odd set of solid silver spoons, a wedding present, yet unboxed Armed with spoons and pajamas, I boarde the morning bus for Tyler. The spoons went fo a hat and an upswept permanent. On anothe side street I found a shop that would give me good basic dress for the Russian pajamas.

Teacher applicants swarmed the Baker Hote that day in Dallas—teachers taller, brighter more stylish than I. But Ben's need in my eyes, unmentioned, must have got me the job.

We rode the Texas Pacific's train to Fabens in August. I had been appointed English teacher in the high school.

Ben cannot remember the thousand-mile ride in a day coach when curious eyes peered at the still, small form on the pillow. Though there was no blemish of body, no curvature of bone, Ben could not turn in bed, sit, hold up his head or grasp an object.

Nonie, wheat plaits stolidly around her head, held Ben quietly, firmly. Nonie —— This day-coach trip gave me time to stop and think about my mother.
